

THE WORLD'S LEADING MYSTERY MAGAZINE

ELLERY QUEEN'S

DECEMBER 1971 75¢

02057

Mystery Magazine

ALL NEW ISSUE
13 NEW stories

detection	HUGH PENTECOST	John Jericho
legal beagles	MICHAEL GILBERT	Preece & Sexton
Thanksgiving	LAWRENCE TREAT	police procedural detection	PHYLLIS BENTLEY	Miss Phipps detection	EDWARD D. HOCH	Captain Leopold
cipher story	ALAN D. YOUNG	Professor Ponsonby
crime	FLORENCE V. MAYBERRY	Reno

COPIES ARE STILL AVAILABLE- If you order NOW!

Yes! Copies are still available of the new Ellery Queen's 1971 Anthology; Volume #22. The best collection of mystery, suspense, crime and detective stories, some of them written by world-famous writers. This is the kind of reading that will keep you completely engrossed ... for a week or a weekend.

If you have never read a mystery Anthology before, don't miss this one! It's crammed full of excitement. There are chills and thrills to satisfy the most demanding of mystery readers.

Be sure to get your copy ... mail the handy coupon today.

ELLERY QUEEN'S ANTHOLOGY
Dept. DP-14
229 Park Avenue South
New York, N.Y. 10003

Please send me _____ copy(s) of the new ELLERY QUEEN'S 1971
ANTHOLOGY Volume #22. I am enclosing $1.50 PLUS 25c for postage and handling for each copy.

Name _____
(please print)

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

(Turn to page 33 for extra coupon)

ELLERY QUEEN'S ANTHOLOGY 1971 FALL-WINTER

ELLERY QUEEN'S MYSTERY ANTHOLOGY 1971 FALL-WINTER VOLUME

$1.50

12 SHORT STORIES AND NOVELS

Georges Simenon
Donald E. Westlake
Paul Gallico
Hugh Walpole
Julian Symons
Robert L. Fish
Gerald Kersh
O. Henry
Patricia McGerr
Robert Somerlott
Libby MacCall
Ellery Queen

3 SHORT
NOVELS COMPLETE
IN THIS VOLUME

REX STOUT
and NERO WOLFE
HUGH PENTECOST
and
JOHN JERICHO MICHAEL GILBERT
and INSPECTOR PETRELLA

the WHO'S WHO of WHODUNITS

LICENSED TO UNZ.ORG
ELECTRONIC REPRODUCTION PROHIBITED

The World's Leading Mystery Magazine

ELLERY QUEEN'S Mystery Magazine

ALL-NEW ISSUE

8 NEW detective short stories

JERICHO AND THE DEAD CLUE	Hugh Pentecost	6
MISS PHIPPS IS TOO MODEST	Phyllis Bentley	34
REPORT ON A BROKEN BRIDGE	Dennis O'Neil	46
PONSONBY AND THE CLASSIC CIPHER	Alan K. Young	67
CAPTAIN LEOPOLD DOES HIS JOB	Edward D. Hoch	93
THE CASE OF THE UNTRACEABLE GUNS	Raymond D. Stenzel	112
K AS IN KIDNAPING	Lawrence Treat	133
ACCESSORIES AFTER THE FACT	Michael Gilbert	148

5 NEW crime short stories

TO FIND A MILLIONAIRE	Florence V. Mayberry	18
THIRTEEN	R. L. Stevens	60
THE DARK PLACE	Richard A. Selzer	83
AGONY COLUMN	Barry N. Malzberg	105
THE HOT TAMALES MURDER CASE	J. F. Peirce	123

THE JURY BOX

John Dickson Carr 65

INDEX TO VOLUME FIFTY-EIGHT

160-147

CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD: B. G. Davis

EDITOR-IN-CHIEF: Ellery Queen

Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine, Vol. 58, No. 6, Whole No. 337, DEC., 1971. Published monthly by Davis Publications, Inc., at 75¢ a copy. Annual subscription $9.00 in U.S.A., and possessions and Canada; $10.00 in the Pan American Union; $10.00 in all other countries. Editorial and General Offices, 229 Park Avenue South, New York, N. Y. 10003. Change of address notices, undeliverable copies, orders for subscriptions and other mail items are to be sent to 229 Park Avenue South, New York, N. Y. 10003. Office of Publication — 1 Appleton Street, Holyoke, Mass. 01040. Second-Class postage paid at Holyoke, Mass. 01040. © 1971 by Davis Publications, Inc. All rights reserved. Protection secured under the Universal Copyright Convention and the Pan American Copyright Convention. Printed in U.S.A. Submission must be accompanied by stamped self-addressed envelope: the Publisher assumes no responsibility for unsolicited manuscripts.

JOEL DAVIS, President & Publisher

VICTOR C. STABILE, Vice Pres. & Treas. — LEONARD F. PINTO, Vice Pres. & General Manager

ELEANOR SULLIVAN, Managing Editor — CONSTANCE DIRIENZO, Executive Editorial Secretary

DAVID MILLER, Advg. Manager — CARL BARTEE, Prod. Director — IRVING BERNSTEIN, Art Director

A sensible way to protect (and preserve) your copies of

ELLERY QUEEN'S MYSTERY MAGAZINE

A durable, custom-designed Library Case will protect your copies of Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine from dust and wear. At the same time, it will help you conserve valuable space and reduce Library clutter.

Each Library Case has a muscular 8" x 5 5/8" x 3 3/16" frame that can hold 6 issues of Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine. In elegant washable Red simulated leather, its spine is embossed with 16-k gold lettering for maximum legibility. (Each Library Case also includes gold transfer so you can print the volume and year each case contains.) To order, merely fill in and return the form below.

TO: JESSE JONES BOX CORP.
P.O. BOX 5120 © DEPT. D
PHILADELPHIA, PA. 19141

Please send me _____ Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine Library Cases at $3.50 each.* I understand this price includes postage, packing, and handling. (*3 Library Cases for $10.00, 6 for $19.00.) My check (or money order) for _____ is enclosed.

NAME (PLEASE PRINT) _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ STATE _____ ZIP _____

Note: Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded. Allow 3 weeks for delivery.

WE'RE CLEANING HOUSE!

...and look what we found—the hiding place of a number of back issues of EQMM! And all these magazines are in never-used, mint condition.

Now that we've discovered this secret hiding place, we would like to make a sensational offer to all loyal mystery fans of EQMM.

You can purchase 10 issues of EQMM for only $3.00—a savings of nearly 60%. These are the same "who-dunits" that regularly sold at 60¢ at newsstands and by subscription.

So don't wait—first come first served. Of course, you understand that the supply is limited; and that we cannot fill requests for specific issues.

Use the coupon below and we'll rush you a Jumbo package of suspenseful reading.

ELLERY QUEEN'S HOUSEKEEPER Dept. 959
229 Park Avenue South
New York, N.Y. 10003

I am enclosing _____ $3.00 for 10 issues.
Rush me the assorted back copies of EQMM.

Name _____
(Please Print)

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY OFFER TO
ELLERY QUEEN'S MYSTERY MAGAZINE
ONE FULL YEAR—ONLY $4.67

A REGULAR $9.00 VALUE—YOU SAVE $4.33

The best in mysteries

Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine has for over 30 years published the best in mystery-detective suspense short stories and short novels. According to the New York Times, it is "the best crime-fiction periodical ever published."

Award winners

Winner of a special Edgar Award from the Mystery Writers of America, EQMM has published every important crime writer who ever wrote a short story as well as many writers of general fiction, including 27 Pulitzer and 11 Nobel prize-winners.

New and unusual

New writers as well as name writers are published in Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine. Since its inception, EQMM has presented more than 350 "first stories," by new authors whose fiction has never before been in print. In addition to the diversified stories, the magazine also features "The Jury Box," John Dickson Carr's incisive monthly column reviewing recently published books in the genre.

Limited offer

We urge you to order your subscription to EQMM today, so that your copies will start coming right away. Orders will be processed so that you will receive the very next available issue. We will enter your subscription to EQMM for only $4.67, 1 full year—12 issues... saving you $4.33 off the regular price.

ELLERY QUEEN'S MYSTERY MAGAZINE Dept. 722
229 Park Avenue South, New York, N.Y. 10003

Please enter my 1-year subscription to EQMM at the special rate of only $4.67 . . . less than 40¢ an issue!

☐ New Subscription

☐ Renewal Subscription

☐ Payment enclosed

☐ Bill me later

(Outside U.S.A. and Canada, add $2)

NAME _____
(please print)

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ STATE _____ ZIP _____

a NEW John Jericho story by

HUGH PENTECOST

John Jericho, the huge red-bearded artist and the self-appointed fighter for all the underdogs in the world, has a strange and moving encounter on a mountain. It was nearly midnight—a pitch-black night lashed by rain and wind. And what Jericho found on the narrow dirt road, in the gleam of his headlights, turned on all his anger . . .

JERICO AND THE DEAD CLUE

by HUGH PENTECOST

The rain beat against the windshield of the red Mercedes. The windshield wipers fought a losing battle against the torrent of water. The night was pitch-black except for an occasional jagged flash of lightning in the distance, which revealed the trees bent by the swirling wind. Jericho, his huge body crouched over the wheel, was straining to see the few yards ahead of the car which was all the vision of the narrow dirt road his headlights revealed. Damn the gas-station attendant who had told him this short cut would save him five miles in reaching the Foster estate! In places the road had been so encroached upon by brush it was almost impassable.

Fortunately the Mercedes was only creeping through the storm when Jericho saw the girl just eight or ten yards ahead of him. She was sitting in the middle of the road, cradling something in her lap. The brakes squealed as Jericho came to a stop a few feet in front of her.

She sat there, bent over the thing in her lap, apparently unaware of the cones of light that surrounded her. She was wearing some kind of open-necked blouse and slacks. Her hair was matted to her head.

Jericho swore. He had no raincoat or hat in the car. He sounded the horn. The girl didn't move. Jericho turned up the collar of his tweed jacket, opened the car door, and stepped out into the wild night. The rain, slashed at him. He stepped over to the girl and bent down, water running off the tip of his red beard.

© 1971 by Hugh Pentecost.

He touched the girl's shoulder. She didn't move. She was still bent down over the thing in her lap. Jericho saw that it was a large dog, a Golden Retriever he thought. A tongue lolled grotesquely out of the side of the dog's mouth.

The girl said something he couldn't hear over the rain and wind and the distant rumble of thunder.

"What?" he shouted at her.

She looked up at him. Her face was small, pert, tragedy-twisted. "I think he's dead," she said in a high thin voice.

"You can't sit here in the middle of the road," Jericho said.

"I—I can't lift him," the girl said.

"I'll help you."

"Can—can you make sure he's dead? I mean—if he isn't and moving him would be painful—"

Jericho squatted close to her and raised the dog's head. The side that had been in her lap was smashed in like a broken eggshell. Jericho sensed the sticky feel of blood in the palm of his hand.

"He's dead," he said.

"Please help," the girl said. Her mouth was drawn down at the corners. Jericho couldn't distinguish rain from tears. For a moment he thought she might be only twelve or thirteen. Then, as he bent closer to get his arms under the dog's body, he became aware of the smell of liquor on the girl's breath.

He lifted the heavy dog into his arms and carried it over to the side of the road. He started to put the body down. The girl was at his side, her slim shoulder touching him. He could feel her shaking.

"We can't leave him here," she said.

"Where?" Jericho shouted at her.

A flash of lightning revealed her small tortured face. He was angry, annoyed, soaked to the skin, but he felt pity for her. She waved vaguely down the road.

"My cabin is about a hundred yards in from the road," she said. "Could you—would you—?"

"I can't leave my car here," he said.

"There's a place to park just ahead—on the right-hand side," she said.

He couldn't be any wetter than he was. He put the dog's body down on the grass. "Show me," he said.

She knelt beside the dog, a hand on the shattered head. "It's just a few yards," she said.

Jericho went back to the car, muttering to himself. He got in and pulled ahead. He saw a little area cut out of the brush and a narrow path leading away into the darkness. He parked the car, got a flashlight out of the glove compartment, and went back to the girl.

"You light the way," he said.

She stood up and took the flash. Jericho lifted the dog again and followed. The girl's judgment of distance was faulty. He guessed it was closer to three hundred yards before they came into a clearing. He saw a feeble light burning in the window of some sort of shack.

The girl reached the door and opened it. She stood aside.

"You want him in the house?" he asked.

"Where else? This is where he lived," she said.

The light came from an old-fashioned kerosene lamp. The shack consisted of one large room. There was an iron sink in one corner with a pump-handle device that evidently produced water from a well. There was a kerosene stove, a double bed, a box spring on an iron frame, covered with a torn spread and some cushions. There were two overstuffed armchairs, a small table with a wooden kitchen chair pulled up to it. On the table was a jelly glass, an empty bourbon bottle, and one half full. Beside the bed was a new and modern-looking AM-FM radio, obviously battery operated. At the foot of the bed, on the floor, was a small mat covered with an old army blanket. The girl pointed to it.

"That's Igor's bed," she said. "Will you put him there, please."

Jericho put the dog down and stood up, flexing his aching arm muscles. The girl had gone to a bureau and came back with a bath towel which she handed to Jericho.

"Help you get a little dry," she said.

He took the towel and dried his thick red hair and his bearded face. The girl got a towel for herself. When she had dried her hair a little he saw that it was long and blonde. She went over to the stove and got a second jelly glass, then poured two large drinks of bourbon into the glasses.

"You don't want to get pneumonia," she said.

There was a strange elfin quality to her.

"You camping out here? Vacationing?" he asked.

"I live here," she said.

He took a long swallow of the bourbon and was grateful for its quick warmth.

"I'm sorry about your dog," he said.

Her lips quivered. "I—I just don't understand it," she said.

"It's pretty hard to see anything in this storm," he said.

"If I hadn't been crawling I'd almost certainly have run you down."

"It's the first time Igor has ever left me since—since David went away," the girl said.

"David?"

"My David," the girl said. "He left me the shack, and he left me Igor. Igor has never gone twenty yards away from the shack before unless he went with me. But tonight, in this storm, he went all the way out to the road. I just don't understand it."

"So he wandered off. I'm sorry. You didn't see or hear a car?"

"You couldn't hear a motor in this storm, and you can't see lights on the road from here. Igor asked to go out. I thought he must have an upset stomach or something because he's afraid of thunderstorms. When—when he didn't bark to come in again, I finally went to look for him. I—I opened the door and I—I thought I heard him howling—far away. Of course, it could have been the wind. I ran down the path and finally, when I reached the road, I stumbled over him. I—I think he was still alive then. But he died while I was trying to comfort him. Another slug?" She pointed to his glass.

"Thanks," he said.

She poured him a generous refill. "You're wondering about me," she said.

"Well, yes, I am."

"David brought me here," she said. "I mean it was the only place he could bring me to after his family cut him off."

"Cut him off?"

"They didn't approve of me," the girl said. There was a threat of underlying hysteria in the high voice, in the compulsive rapidity of her words. "I had been a hostess in a discotheque in Vegas. David was there on leave. We—we got together."

"And his family cut him off because of you?"

"That left us up the creek because of course David couldn't get a job—he was still in the Army. But he did own this shack, and there was Igor, and there was the Jaguar convertible which he turned into cash. David deeded over this place to me in spite of everything Milo could do, and he told me to wait here till he got back—which would be about a year—and he—"

"Back from Vietnam?"

"Only he isn't coming back," the girl said, her teeth chattering against the rim of the jelly glass as she swallowed her bourbon. "Missing in action. And Milo tells me there's no use waiting, and I should go somewhere, and if I should happen to be pregnant he will arrange for—"

"Milo. I'm on my way to visit a man named Milo Foster. Is he—?"

"David's father," the girl said.

"Were you married to David?"

The girl shook her head. "David thought it wouldn't be fair. He thought it might happen just the way it has happened. He'd turn up missing, or something, and I'd be tied to a ghost—that was the way he put it. But he gave me all he had. This shack his father gave him when he was a kid, and Igor. And the money from the Jaguar. And it's almost a year now."

She glanced down at the body of the dog. "Maybe it's the best way out for poor Igor. Because there isn't much money left and soon I might've had to turn Igor over to the SPCA. That would have killed him because David told him to stay with me and he did, every minute of every day and night—until tonight. If Igor had any time to think about it before he died, he must have thought God had struck him dead for disobeying David's orders."

"You loved David?"

"If he had asked me to lie down and let a truck run over me I would have. Loved him?" Her voice rose. "He was the only decent thing that ever happened to me in my whole life—him and Igor. So I will wait here for him forever—or until the Army changes the word 'missing' to 'killed in action.' As long as there's a chance for him to come back I'll be here when he comes. No matter what Milo does! No matter what!"

Jericho drew a deep breath. "My name is Jericho," he said. "John Jericho. I'm a painter."

Her eyes widened. "David was a painter, too," she said.

"I know."

"You've seen his work?" Her excitement was high.

"No. But Milo Foster is giving a new wing to a museum in David's name. That's why I'm on my way to see him. To arrange the details."

She seemed to freeze. "Does he know David is dead, and hasn't told me?"

"I don't know."

Her hands reached up and touched the sodden lapels of his tweed jacket. "Will you find out? Will you please, please find out for me? Because if David is dead and Igor is dead—”

“What will you do?”

“I don’t know,” she said vaguely. “Go back to where I was—or maybe take a handful of sleeping pills. I don’t know.”

“What’s your name? You haven’t told me, you know.”

“Angel Kelly,” she said.

A flash of lightning revealed the Foster mansion. Jericho had the absurd notion that he was looking at the castle of the Wicked Witch in The Wizard of Oz—turrets, towers, battlements. Lights blazed in dozens of windows.

The violence of the storm had decreased by now, the lightning being of the “heat” variety. The wind had let up, but the rain was still heavy and steady. Jericho glanced at the clock on the dashboard of the Mercedes. It was just a few minutes past midnight.

As Jericho pulled up at the front of the house a man in a black slicker and black rainhat came running down a short, wide flight of stone steps carrying a bright-colored golf umbrella.

“Mr. Jericho?” A dark face peered through the side window of the car.

“Yes.”

“Mr. Foster was very worried about you, sir,” the man said. “He was about to alert the State Police. Your bags, sir?”

“In the trunk,” Jericho said.

“If you’ll give me the keys, sir, I’ll get them. You take the umbrella.”

Milo Foster was impressive. He couldn’t quite match Jericho’s six feet four inches, but he was almost as broad and powerful-looking, even though he was ten years older. Curly white hair glittered in the bright lights of a huge entrance hall. Behind him on the stuccoed walls Jericho recognized a priceless Velasquez and a Chagall he had never known existed.

Foster’s smile was white and wide; his handshake rock-hard. “My dear fellow, I’m relieved to see you,” he said. His face clouded. “You’re soaking wet, man. Tire trouble?”

“A small adventure, thanks to a filling-station man who assured me there was a short cut over the mountain.”

“On a night like this? Idiot.” He turned to the black-slickered man who appeared with Jericho’s bags. “Take Mr. Jericho’s bags to his room, Max. See that he has what he needs. I recommend a good solid whiskey or brandy, Jericho. Can I have some food ordered for you?”

“A drink would be fine,” Jericho said. “And a hot shower.”

He followed the slickered

Max to the foot of a wide winding stairway—and was confronted by a vision. His painter's eye told him he was looking at one of the most beautiful women he had ever seen. She was dark, tanned by the sun, tall, lithe, with a magnificent figure that was not hidden by a bright scarlet floor-length housecoat.

"Miss Arabella Khalkis—Mr. John Jericho," Foster said.

The girl's smile was dazzling.

Miss Khalkis is—was—David's fiancée," Foster said. "Mr. Jericho will join us in the library when he's had a chance to get into some dry clothes, my dear."

"I look forward to that," Arabella Khalkis said. "I'm a great admirer of your painting, Mr. Jericho."

"I am instantly an admirer of yours, Miss Khalkis."

She looked pleased. Khalkis? It rang some sort of bell in Jericho's memory. One of the Greek industrial tycoons? If so, Arabella must be the heiress to a fabulous fortune. It would seem that drowned rat of a girl in that miserable shack in the woods, crooning over the body of a dead dog, could never have provided a moment's competition for Arabella Khalkis.

Max took Jericho to a high-ceilinged bedroom. Again there were paintings—a Benton, a Wyeth. Foster's interest in art was genuine, his taste impeccable. There was a fully stocked portable bar next to a giant fourposter. Max put the bags on a folding rack, then opened the door to a bathroom, revealing a black marble tub as large as a small swimming pool.

"Would you like to soak in the tub, sir, or would you prefer to use the shower?"

"The shower will be fine," Jericho said.

"Can I make you a drink, sir?"

Jericho glanced at the bar. "Bourbon on the rocks, please." Max, he saw, with his rainhat removed, was handsome in a way—dark, aquiline, only a thin scar running from the corner of one eye up into the coal-black hairline spoiling a kind of rugged perfection.

"You had trouble on the mountain, sir?"

"I ran into someone who had trouble," Jericho said.

The black eyes narrowed. "A girl, sir?"

Something warned Jericho. "A dog," he said. "Run over by someone in the storm."

"I see." Max drew a deep breath. "You'll find the library across the hall to the right when you come downstairs, sir."

"Thanks," Jericho said.

A steaming hot shower, dry clothes, and a stiff drink made a new man of Jericho. He found Foster and the beautiful Arabella in a book-lined library. There was another portable bar, and on a side table were a cold ham, cheeses, breads, crackers, olives, shrimps with a Russian-dressing dip. Arabella sat in a high-backed armchair next to a low-burning fire. The flickering flames cast mysterious light changes on her lovely face.

"Max tells me that you came on an injured dog on the mountain road," Foster said.

Jericho crossed to the bar and made himself a drink. He was aware of being watched closely. "A dead dog," he said. He poured bourbon on the rocks. "The girl is alive." He turned and looked at his host and Arabella. Foster's smile was gone, Arabella's expression was unchanged—a kind of mysterious inner amusement.

"I almost ran over the girl," Jericho said. "She was sitting in the middle of the road holding the dog in her arms."

"Too bad," Foster said. "The dog was a valuable dog, extremely well-bred."

"Unlike the girl," Arabella said, smiling into the fire.

A small muscle rippled along Jericho's jaw, under the red beard. "I found the girl refreshingly loyal," he said.

"So you met Miss Angel Kelly," Foster said.

"I met her."

"Most extraordinary and inexplicable situation," Foster said. "Would you believe it, Jericho, that the first night David met her he paid her for the time they spent together?"

"A common tramp," Arabella said.

"There's essentially no difference between the street girl who demands five dollars on the barrelhead," Jericho said, "and the society girl who insists on cocktails, caviar, and a visit to the Royal ballet before she says 'yes.'"

"Even five dollars would seem to be an exorbitant price to pay for that scrawny little plucked chicken," Arabella Khalkis said.

"But loyalty can't be bought," Jericho said.

"Loyalty!" Foster exploded. "She's sitting there, waiting for the news that David is dead. She thinks then I will pay her to get out of my sight."

"Then why don't you tell her the boy is alive?" Jericho said, deady quiet.

"If only we knew," Arabella said.

"Where have you got him hidden?" Jericho asked.

Foster's face had turned to stone. "What are you talking about?"

"The fact that you can't buy loyalty," Jericho said. "The girl has it. The dog had it. Is David here in the house now?"

"He's missing in action—in Vietnam," Foster said.

"Are you trying to convince me he's not here?"

"You're out of your mind, Jericho!"

"You can't buy loyalty, particularly from a dog," Jericho persisted. "That retriever had never gone twenty yards away from Angel Kelly until tonight. Whom would he leave her for?"

"Another dog," Arabella said.

"I think not. I think the dog left Angel Kelly to follow his master—David."

"She told you that? The girl told you she'd seen David?" Foster exchanged a quick glance with Arabella.

"She didn't see him," Jericho said. "I suspect he went to see her. Maybe, in view of your plans for him, he just meant to catch a glimpse of her without her knowing. Maybe you discovered he was missing, went after him, and got to him before he could reach the cabin. But the dog sensed his nearness."

Foster stood very straight and still. "You have come here as my guest, Mr. Jericho. We have tried to offer you every courtesy. You repay us with this lunacy. Arabella and I have both suffered too much from the tragedy of David's probable death to be subjected to this cruel and senseless melodrama. I must ask you to leave."

"I offer you an alternative," Jericho said. "Let me search the house for David. Otherwise I will have the proper authorities here with the proper warrants before you can whisk him away to some Greek island paradise—which I take is your plan."

The door to the library opened and the man called Max came in. He was wearing a dark suit with a black turtle-necked sweater. He had a machine pistol tucked under his arm. Jericho smiled at him.

"I see you are readier to believe I mean business, Max, than your employers are," he said.

"Why, Jericho? Why?" Foster cried out in a shaken voice.

"I'm an admirer of loyalty," Jericho said. "The dog and the girl are getting short-changed for theirs."

Arabella leaned her dark head back against the high-backed chair, still smiling. "Have you ever heard of Theofiledes Khalkis, Mr. Jericho? He is my father. He has money enough to buy anything he wants. He was even able to buy David's release from a Vietcong prison camp."

"Then why not a ticker-tape parade up Broadway? Escaped war hero! No, Miss Khalkis, David is a deserter and you and your father—and his father—are helping him to avoid the consequences."

"Have you no sympathy, no pity?" Foster cried. His rock-hard exterior was crumbling.

"Yes, I have sympathy for any man who wants to get out of a war," Jericho said. "I just might turn my back on his efforts to escape such a horror. But he said to the dog, 'Stay till I come back,' and he said to the girl, 'Stay till I come back,' and they both did exactly what he asked. And now he will slip away without their knowing—at least for a long time—that they have been discarded. I don't choose to turn my back on that, Foster. Quixotic? Perhaps; but that's the way it is."

"What is your price, Mr. Jericho?" Arabella asked. "Every man has his price."

"And your father can pay whatever it is?"

"Yes."

"Your father couldn't pay my price," Jericho said.

"What is it?"

"David Foster must go to that cabin in the woods. He must help the girl bury their dog. And then he must tell her that he no longer cares for her, that he chooses freedom and the glamorous Miss Khalkis. I think Angel Kelly might understand that—but she must be told by him. That is my price, Miss Khalkis."

"There is another alternative, Miss Khalkis," Max said quietly. He lifted the machine pistol. "Let me use this."

"Does your father also pay your gunman, Miss Khalkis?" Jericho asked.

Arabella rose and stood, straight and lovely, by her chair. "Everything in the world is paid for by someone who wants it badly enough, Mr. Jericho," she said. "I want David, and my father will pay anything required to get him for me. Your disappearance might cause a ripple or two, but no one in the world could trace it to this house or to us."

"Then you'd better get on with it," Jericho said, "because you can't count on any promise I might make you under pressure." He had gauged the distance between himself and Max and he knew he could never cover even the few feet of Turkish rug and stay alive.

"I'll give you one last reasonable argument," Arabella said. "I admit that David had doubts. He didn't want to go away without explaining to that little tramp in the mountain cabin. We made it clear to him that if he saw her she could ruin his chances of getting away. He finally seemed to see the light, but when we had relaxed he took off for the mountain. Max went after him, but it proved to be unnecessary. David got to the shack, peered through the window at her, and knew that he had been dreaming a false dream. He came away without letting her know he'd been there. He had made his choice."

"Then he was a damn fool," Jericho said. "Maybe Angel Kelly is better off. Any man who would choose to be a pet poodle on a Greek island instead of a real man living with a real woman deserves someone like you, Miss Khalkis."

"You are being a foolish, old-world knight in shining armor, Mr. Jericho. Why on earth should you give up your life for that stupid slut?"

"Because I would have to live with myself if I let you have your way," Jericho said.

Arabella turned with a weary shrug of her lovely shoulders. "Take him away, Max. Do what has to be done," she said.

"No!" Foster cried out. "Not murder. There has to be some other way."

"Max!" Arabella said.

"Come on, buster," Max said to Jericho, the machine pistol aimed at Jericho's heart.

"You're going to have to do it here, Max, right on the Turkish rug. I want Foster and Miss Khalkis to live with the picture of it for the rest of their lives."

Arabella turned again, her eyes blazing. "If it must be that way, so be it. Max!"

Okay, Jericho thought, his muscles tensing, I can at least die rushing him.

There was a sharp knock at the library door. It opened and a maid in a black and white uniform came into the room.

"I'm sorry to interrupt, Mr. Foster," she said, "but Mr. David said I should give you this immediately." She crossed to Foster and handed him a folded piece of paper. She seemed not to see Max or the machine pistol. Then she turned and hurried out of the room.

Foster unfolded the paper. A nerve twitched high up on his cheek. A great physical weariness seemed about to overcome him. He steadied himself with a hand on the back of a chair. His voice was low and hoarse as he read aloud.

"Father: I have been listening, and Jericho has made it clear to me what a heel I've been. I have betrayed the only two people who really love me. Poor Igor! He followed me home after my cowardice and Max ran him down. Igor's presence here would have been a giveaway, wouldn't it? And Max would have killed Angel if she had seen me! Well, it's too late now, Father. I've gone back to the mountain and I'm going to turn myself in. If I have to pay for Angel and her loyalty with a piece of my life in jail it will be worth it . . . David.' "

"Idiot!" Arabella said.

"Surely you wouldn't want an idiot for a husband, would you, Miss Khalkis?" Jericho said. He was smiling.

"Get out!" Arabella said.

"Thanks," Jericho said. He glanced at Foster. "I think you can start being proud of your boy." He moved toward the door. Max had turned his head toward Arabella, expecting some last-minute change of heart. Jericho's move was deadly. He ripped the machine pistol out of Max's hands. His right fist struck with sledge-hammer force to the man's jaw, hurtling him back against the wall where he slid down and lay still.

"That, friend, is for the dog," Jericho said, and walked out of the room without looking back.

a NEW Reno story by FLORENCE V. MAYBERRY

Florence V. Mayberry has a "way with her" when she writes about Reno and the Nevada scene. We know of no other writer who generates quite the same emotional impact, casts quite the same spell . . . In "To Find a Millionaire," Florence V. Mayberry tells a curiously claustrophobic story. Its lingering bittersweetness, its "floating, spinning, whirling," and most of all, its inherent sense of evil, may make you shiver—a little . . .

TO FIND A MILLIONAIRE

by FLORENCE V. MAYBERRY

I came into Reno on a bus. From Sacramento. Of course, Sacramento had been just one more stop on my way up from Bakersfield, Delano, Fresno. Out of cotton fields, vineyards, hamburger joints, cheap night clubs.

I asked around Reno that day about where there might be a good place for a girl to get a job. Dancing. Singing was out—I croak like a young boy just as his voice is thinking about changing. But it sounds okay when I talk. Throaty, sort of.

Well, I got talking to a fellow, old guy maybe 35, at a lunch counter. He said he was a dealer in one of the gambling clubs. I didn't like his looks. He had a tight face, not bad-looking, but tight like something inside of him had been pulled into a hard knot. And his eyes had a slithery feel on me. But he was somebody who seemed to know his way around Reno.

I told him I was a pretty good dancer, that I'd danced in California clubs. He said there was a place in town called Sadie's Stable, and Sadie the boss was always looking for pretty kids. "I've got a night off coming up," he said. "Like tonight. Why don't I take you out and show you off? And if you don't make it at Sadie's, you might try for a job shilling—hey, how old are you anyway?"

© 1971 by Florence V. Mayberry.

"Twenty-one," I said. It was a lie. Seven more months and I would be 18.

"Yeah," he said. "Sure you are. You, just look young for your age. About the only way you can get inside Sadie's is if you land a job there, you look too young for a customer. Well, we can try. Anyway, how about a date tonight? I'll take you to Sadie's and she can look you over in her office."

He tried for a big generous-hearted smile. But his face was too tight. And I'm sitting there wondering what kind of a commission he's planning on asking.

"You'll get the job," he said. "You've got everything. Shape, looks, and if you can dance too, man! Anyway, honey, if you don't get the job there's nothing to worry about. Nothing. Not as long as old Harry has a job. And I get paid good."

So I knew his name. Harry. And I was getting filled in about that commission.

Harry and I went out to Sadie's Stable that night. I met him on a street corner I picked out. Down near the bus station. It was none of Harry's business where I lived. Or that I didn't live anywhere. I took my suitcase out of the checking locker at the bus station, and washed up and changed clothes in the Ladies john. Messy place.

Women crowding in while I was changing.

Of course I didn't own the john, so I had no right to complain. But that didn't help. I never could stand being crowded up with people. I hate dirt and lack of privacy. All my life I've had a lot of the first, and nothing much of the second.

Sadie was big and blonde and her voice was rough from singing and fighting her way through a lifetime of show business and night clubs. She threw her arms around me at first sight and smacked me on the cheek. It made me shiver. I just can't stand being pawed at.

"Honey, you were made for Sadie's place. Say, kid, lift your skirt, let's see your legs. Yeah, okay, fit the rest of you. Harry, lookit that long shiny black hair and those slanty blue eyes, really something. You say you can dance, what kinda dancing?"

Any kind, I told her. You ask for it, I'll give it to you.

That was no lie. I never had many lessons. Foster parents aren't usually keen on laying out extra money for dancing lessons. But one set did for a while. After that, I looked up dancing schools wherever I was and just walked in, sat down, and watched while the classes were going on. A couple of them put me out, but all the others just let me alone. So I watched.

Then I went wherever I could that was private and I practised. Usually it was the gym in the grammar schools—I never made but one year of high school. I told the gym teacher I was practising for a program. I was. A program like getting a fancy job so I could quit being a foster kid, and rent a room all by myself, and finally find a rich man who would love me like crazy because I danced so good, and marry me and give me all his money. Somehow, in all my dreams, the guy himself somehow got lost.

"Okay, honey," Sadie said. "You can work out for me tomorrow afternoon. Show up here at three."

Harry squeezed my arm as we left Sadie's office and went to the Stable's entrance. You know something? It was a laugh. The doorman wouldn't let me in. Said I was too young or else show proof I wasn't. I had a job there, but couldn't get in as customer.

"That's okay, honey," Harry said, smiling like he had just eaten something that tasted good. "We'll go on up to my apartment and hoist a few."

"I don't drink," I said. In one of my foster homes the man took spells of lying in bed for weeks nursing on a bottle. Of whiskey. "I don't drink, unless you're talking about milk."

"Honey, I'll go milk the cow myself," Harry said. "Now listen, baby, let's straighten this out right at the start. Don't try to be wise. I got down early on that corner tonight to meet you. And I saw you come out of the bus station. So I've got a hunch you're broke and don't have any place to stay. So why not make my place your headquarters?"

"Well, no, I couldn't do that." I could feel my eyes slant even more than the way they were born, like they do when I start getting mad. Who knows, maybe one of my grandpas or grandmas was an Oriental. Seeing that I don't even know if I had any parents, maybe just grew, who knows? But I like to think I'm part Chinese. They're quiet, personal people.

"That wouldn't be right, Harry," I said. "I told you a lie. I'm really a minor. You could get in a lot of trouble."

"Who's to know?"

"Me," I said.

His voice got hard. "Listen, little gal, don't try to outsmart a grownup. Especially a grown-up in my line of business in Reno. Reno runs on a big-time scale. No small-town smartaleck stuff. And a kid like you, with nobody to look after her, can get hurt. Bad. Now I did you a favor. Got you a job."

"Thanks, Harry. Thank you very much. One of these days I may have to get you a job."

He drew back his hand to slap me. But some couples were walking from their cars in the parking lot toward the Stable's entrance. He put his hand down. "You want me to go tell Sadie she's in for trouble—that she's hired a minor?"

Oh, boy. And he said he was a grownup. All Sadie would have to do, with me backing her, would claim she was acting as my guardian. I said, "I'll go tell Sadie myself."

So I walked back to the office. Alone. I told her, and that I would need an advance to keep this character. Harry from turning me into the cops for sleeping in a public place.

Sadie suggested I move in with some of the other kids. But I told her no, I had a thing about living with people. It was either advance me some money, or back to the bus station with Harry. Giving me trouble. Or maybe I could pick up some daytime housework in exchange for room and board. So she gave me an advance.

"Guts, kid," she said.

But it wasn't. It was just that I can't bear being crowded in with anyone. I'd rather go to a park and climb a tree.

I thought I'd walk into town, it wasn't so far. But Harry was waiting outside the door. "Don't be sore, Corianne." I had told him my name. Corianne Smith. Harry had on a real sweet smile and a mean glint in his eye. "You can't blame a guy for trying."

"Maybe you can't," I said. "Look, I appreciate the introduction. Maybe some day I can repay the favor. The same way. But forget anything else." I went back to Sadie, had her call me a cab. Sadie had already called up a roominghouse for me that would let me use a hot plate.

I went out the next afternoon and tried out for Sadie. She said, "You've really got it, kid. Maybe we can work out some specials for you."

Sadie's Stable was big and barny. Gaudy. Raucous. Verging on honkytonk. Not the kind of place I was headed for. But it was a start.

A start to become a top-notch headline dancer? Up the night-club route? Not much. It was my start to find one of those millionaires I'd read about in Fresno and Delano and Sacramento, wherever I'd been, living with foster families, working in the cotton or grapes or dancing in some little club. The California papers were always printing some big story about millionaires coming to Reno. That's why I came to Reno. To find a millionaire.

But the men who showed up alone at the Stable didn't look like millionaires. At least not the way I thought a millionaire ought to look. Dressed quiet, but rich-looking stuff, you know. With a kind of soft shine all over them and their manners, like they'd been buffed down with expensive polish. Maybe 40 or so, old enough to get all that money.

For sure Justo wasn't my type. Justo was wearing pants two sizes too big for him. His coat fit like it had been sawed off and plunked on him. Stiff boardy material. He had on a wool shirt, a wild plaid. His hair grew low on his forehead and he had bushy brows. And he was young. Maybe only 25.

Between numbers we kids in the chorus would slip on regular dresses and circulate on the dance floor. Sadie said to dance with the men who looked lonesome, so they would stay and keep on spending money. The older kids would go into the bar and get a percentage on their drinks. But Sadie told me to stay out of the bar, she didn't want to get closed down, a guardian could go just so far.

On the night Justo first came to Sadie's he was standing at the rim of the dance floor, all by himself. But he didn't look lonely. He was smiling and tapping his foot and looking like he had come with everybody. Across the dance floor, near the entrance, I saw a man standing alone looking over the place. A Cary Grant type in a good suit. To get to him I had to pass this character in the big pants and boxy coat. "Excuse me," I said.

He stepped back, smiling. Somehow his leather shoestring had come untied. It caught between the metal tap and the sole of my slipper and I tripped. Imagine, the guy was wearing ranch boots with leather shoestrings at a night club! He grabbed my shoulders and steadied me. Then is when I saw his eyes. Big and soft. Glowing and yet shy. Like a deer's eyes.

"Poor mees," he said. "Poor mees girl, you hurt? Justo got big feet." He said Justo like Hoo-sto.

Not only a guy with baggy pants, a wool shirt, and leather shoestrings, but he can't talk plain. Only, I never saw eyes like that before.

"No, not hurt," I said. "Thanks."

But his hands didn't let go. "Please. You dance weeth me. Hanh? I not speak good, I dance fine. Basque men dance good. You dance, hanh?"

The tall elegant man I was headed for had just been joined by a redhead, glamorous in a slinky green outfit. On top of that who should walk in past the door man but Harry. Old mean-eyed Harry. Every few nights he was doing this. Must have changed from night shift to days. A couple of times a big fat guy was with him. Once in a while another fellow. But never a girl. Now and then Harry would ask me to dance. Sadie would have given me trouble if I refused him every time. So I danced with him when I couldn't avoid it. Made me crawl. Honest. His touch was just like eyes.

"Okay," I said to Justo.

Justo was not much taller than I was. I'm five five. Maybe he was five eight. And built square, like his coat. Not fat, just square. When I put my hand on his shoulder it was like resting it on an iron shelf. But when he began to dance he was eiderdown. Somehow he seemed to operate on a levitation principle so that his feet, boots and all, moved about a half inch off the floor, all the time.

He swept me into a whirl, spun into some crazy step, part jump, part slide. We floated, spun, whirled, and in between the soft lightness of that there would be a hard staccato step. And all the time he held me a little apart from him, his hand firm and yet light on my back. It was almost like not being touched.

It was such fun, dancing with this strange funny man with the beautiful eyes. It made me laugh.

When the music stopped, sweat was dripping down his cheeks. But you know something? That man smelled like sage. Like the outdoors, fresh and clean. I smiled, and started to leave the floor.

"Pleese, mees girl," he said. "Dance more. My name Justo, you' name please?"

"Corianne." Actually it's Cora Anne.

So we danced again. It was a crazy thought, but I thought it's like dancing with a mountain goat, leaping from crag to crag, all spring, no weight. Or with that Greek god they're always comparing to a goat who tootles on something.

Then we danced again.

Sadie sent one of the kids after me. Sadie was kind of burned when she talked to me. "What's a beautiful kid like you doing messing around with a sheepherder? Bartender says he's a Basque sheepherder. You wanna go out in the hills and herd sheep? Listen, Corianne, you got everything going for you—talent, looks, and Sadie to back you up. And, listen, if you wanna waste time, whyn't you dance once in a while with Harry? He's complaining around, he brought you out here and now you won't give him hardly a look. If he thinks I back you up in that, he's gonna pass around the word this is a lousy joint. And I got news for you. Harry's only a dealer, but it happens he's real buddy-buddy with the owner of his club.

"And listen, Corianne, something else which may mean something for you. His boss give me a ring, says he's taken a shine to you. He was out here a coupla nights with Harry. You be nice to Harry, you're liable to end up with the boss, how's that, kid?"

Money, I thought. That's how's that. And then I thought, gee, the fat guy. And for all I knew, if you came close to him, he'd be a creep like Harry, with slick eyes and crawly hands.

Now that a rich man was interested in me I should have been glad. Instead, I got a funny feeling in my stomach. Like sick. Like, what would I do if a man like that put his hands on me when I don't like to be touched.

Funny. I kept thinking how clean that Basque sheepherder was, his hands light and his whole heart and body in that crazy leaping dance.

But man oh man, a sheepherder!

I kept a regular taxi call, for a cab to take me home after I was through work. But on this night there at the door was Harry. He smiled like a knife split his face open and he was going to kill the guy who did it.

"Corianne, I've got a friend out here—" He jerked his thumb toward a big black sedan. "Let's the three of us go out to a real place, see a high-class joint for a change. You're probably hungry, we'll buy you the best meal in town."

A big shadowy figure was behind the steering wheel of the sedan. Money. That's what I wanted. But nobody tangible with it. Just money. Rich. Not fat and strange, and a buddy of a guy like Harry. Maybe they would put me between them in the front seat. Crowded. Trapped.

"Thanks," I said. "But I need my sleep."

My taxi showed up just then. I ran to it and jumped in.

The next night this Justo was at the Stable again. He stood on the sidelines, looking shy, his tight curly hair ringing his forehead, a bashful smile turning up his lips. By that time

Sadie was having me do a short solo number in front of the chorus. Whistles went up. I saw Justo's head fling from one side to the other. His jaw was set, thrust forward. He looked angry, like something dirty had been done. To me. I knew it was to me.

As soon as we kids came out on the dance floor after our number, Justo walked straight to me and asked me to dance. He danced slower this time, his face serious. And he held me in an Old Country way, apart from him. "You marry with me," he said flatly. No question. Just said it.

It was such a serious statement of fact that somehow "No" couldn't come out of me. I asked, "Why?"

"Because you yong girl, this no place for you. Justo halp you, take care. You fine strong girl, halp Justo."

I laughed. Not at him. He was too nice, too earnest for that. So he would know I wasn't making fun of him, I patted his cheek. "What a sweet guy," I said.

Justo caught me in those iron arms and spun me around the floor with such leaps and whirls that some of the dancers stood aside and applauded.

"Hey, hey, Justo, they'll toss you out!" I warned him.

He slowed down. "Pleese, mees. Tonight. We marry tonight."

"And go live in a sheep camp?"

He looked as though I had slapped him. "You no like?"

"Look, Justo. I'm a poor kid. All my life I'm a poor kid. And in and out of that life I've scrounged around ranch camps. Picked grapes, picked cotton, hoed weeds. It was worse than the places I lived in in towns. I don't want any more of that."

He looked around this crummy night club, all purple and red and green lights, flash and glitter, gunky marbelized mirrors. "This better than sheep camp?"

"I don't know. Maybe not."

"Then why you stay?"

How do you put it across to a nice guy who likes you that you're looking for a rich guy who can give you money? A big fancy house with polished furniture, thick rugs, lots of bathrooms. Room for privacy. I just shrugged.

At the end of the dance Justo thanked me. Formally. And left. He didn't show up the next night, or the next. But Harry did. I danced with him once, to make Sadie happy. He pulled me tight against his chest, his hand working around my back.

"How about that dinner tonight?" he asked. "I can give my friend a ring, he's anxious to meet a girl like you who keeps herself special."

It sounded wrong. Two men buddy-buddy being interested in the same girl. Like I said, I was only 17, but I'd had a long hard life of watching how things went.

I shook my head, as best I could, the way I was squeezed tight against his chest.

Harry's hand that was holding mine turned my hand back towards my wrist, then twisted it sideways. Just before it hurt too bad he let go. "Smart kids with no sense like you can get hurt. Bad. Why don't you wise up? That is, if you plan to stay in Reno and make a living. Now be sensible. And nice. My boss has a lot of pull around here. You'd be surprised how much pull."

I brought the heel of my slipper down hard on his toes. It had a metal tap on it. Then I whirled and walked away.

Four nights after Justo vanished, my regular taxi call showed up at Sadie's about three in the morning. I climbed in. It was a new cab and a new driver. His face was turned away from me but I could tell by the shape of his head and back it was a new cabbie. So I gave him my address. He nodded, backed out, swerved toward the highway.

Then something about the set of his shoulders rang a bell. I edged around until I could see his profile. It was Justo.

"Justo! What are you doing with this taxi? You're a sheep man, what are you doing with this kind of job?"

"Now I gotta new job," Justo said. "In city, fine city, like you. Justo be big fine city fell-ho, no more sheep. And every night I drive you home."

He stopped in front of my place, got out, opened the door for me. He patted the taxi's hood. "Purty, hanh, no?"

So, a shiny new taxi. "Well, thanks, Justo. But I feel bad about you doing this. You don't belong in a town."

"Oh, sure, I be fine guy now. No dirty sheep. Nice clean people. So, every night I pick you hup, take you home, see you safe."

I froze. Just like the other guys. Everywhere. "Thanks. No. I'll take myself home and see myself safe."

You know what Justo did? He slapped me. First on one cheek, then the other. Not fast. Not hard. Deliberate and controlled. Then he took my hand and led me up the apartment house steps. At my door he said, "You domb girl, you don' onnerstan' Justo. Maybe now you marry? Now? Tonight?"

I could see how he meant it. But I was mad just the same. I wanted to slap him back. But something told me I had better not, I might get the licking of my life. So I just slammed the door on him.

The following night, along about eight, when it came time for me to go out to the Stable for the dinner show, a taxi was waiting outside. The regular call. Justo was driving again.

"Justo, you might as well stop this. Quit this silly job and go back to your sheep camp. I'm not going to marry you."

"You be bad girl then?" Justo said over his shoulder as we headed towards Virginia Street. "Pretty girls need hoosban'."

Oh, damn him! This sweet guy, this sweet shepherd character wanted to take care of me. So had lots of other guys. But not in Justo's way. Not like Justo.

I leaned forward and spoke close to his ear. "Justo, please. Listen, Justo, I'm leveling with you. I'm a poor kid. No family. No nothing. An orphan kid. I've been crowded against, given leftovers, never had any room for myself, fought passes ever since I knew what passes were. But now I'm grownup. I'm going to make myself the kind of life I want."

"I give it to you," Justo said.

"No, Justo, you can't. Not what I want. Everything rich. Never have to look inside any crummy night club, hash house, cotton field ever again. I want a rich husband, gorgeous clothes, and a big house to match. A house with so much room I'll rattle inside it, with maybe two bathrooms all my own, one for morning and one for night. And maybe I never will have any company. Just live nice and quiet. Private."

"Not even you' hoosban' there? Where you find a man like that?"

I put my face on the back of the front seat and cried, and cried. Where would a punk kid like me find a man like that? Was there even a man like that in all the world? Even a rich man would want to be in all my rooms. Touching me. Pawing at me.

Justo was quiet until I pulled myself together. "Wipe you' nose," he said. "Tell that fat old lady you quit now. We marry, we go out sheep camp. Nice and quiet. No bat-room, but plenty room. No company, I tell the boys go out other camp. But one t'ing for sure, you' hoosban' be there."

"Justo, you nut!" I began to laugh. Sweet, yes. But, oh boy! Full steam down a monorail. "Hurry up, I'll be late for work."

That damn Harry was out at Sadie's that night. Came in about midnight. I looked to see if the fat man was with him. But no. Just Harry.

I stayed in the dressing room instead of going out with the kids to dance with the customers. But Sadie ran me out with the others.

First thing, there was Justo, right in front of me, holding out his arms to dance. Sadie's muscle boy stepped between us. He had on a smooth smile for the benefit of the customers but his eyes were like icepicks. "New rule, kid," he said to me. "Sadie just made it. From now on you only dance with the guys she picks. And as for you, shepherd boy, out!" He grabbed Justo's arm.

Justo's stocky body wrenched away. He leaped back, then forward like a charging bull. His head butted the big man's belly. Almost at the same time he swerved and his foot came up hard. The muscle man went down, moaning.

I saw Harry walk fast over to the bartender, and then the bartender reached under the bar. I knew Sadie had him keep a gun there. I shoved in front of Justo and yelled at the bartender, "You shoot him, I'll swear it's murder!"

Justo spoke quietly, with authority. He said, "This my wife. Call you' cops. I close this place. Use little yong girls."

Sadie was out now, a smile cracking through her makeup. She raised her hands towards the crowd. "Okay, folks, just a little family misunderstanding, thass all folks, let's all give these kids a toast they'll be happy ever after from now on, seems a wedding got mixed in here we didn't know about."

She turned to me, the smile still wide. Under her breath she said, "Take your damn sheep-herder and get outa here!"

"I want my money!"

"I'll send it tomorrow, all your stuff, just get outa here!"

Justo took my hand. Man! It was a long walk out, some of the folks laughing, some man yelling, "Don't blame you, guy, if she was mine, I wouldn't let anybody look at her. Except me."

Outside, Justo walked me to the taxi. It was way at the back of the lot out of sight of the entrance, only it and one other car in that back section. I thought, oh boy, will that taxi company ever give him fits, keeping his taxi off duty while he goes nightclubbing.

Beside the taxi Justo took both of my hands and looked at me. "Justo," I said, "you're going to get in trouble with your boss, keeping that taxi off duty."

"Don' fear, sweet Mees Cory." The light was faint, the night dark, but I could see him smile. "Like I tol' you, this my taxi. You' taxi now. I buy. So I take you home at night, see you safe." He was quiet a moment. It was too dark to see clearly those luminous fawn eyes of his, but I could feel them, looking deep into me. "Justo rich. Now got taxi. T'ree hundred sheep my own, some day more. Yes, you my wife? For sure?"

I shook my head. "No, Justo." I began to cry. "No, Justo. I won't marry you."

We were so intent with each other that we didn't see Harry until he was right beside us. Then two strange characters crawled out of the car parked nearby. It was so dark we hadn't seen them.

"That's what I thought," Harry said. "You're not married. This dumb hick was just saving his skin."

Justo catapulted towards him and knocked him down. The two characters grabbed Justo. They were huge, tall and wide. One of them slammed his fist in Justo's mouth, smack! And then a bubbly sound. In the dark the men's figures moved like shadows. Short stocky Justo butted one, leaped and kicked at the other. Then Harry came behind Justo. There was a thud. Justo went down to his knees. Another thud and he toppled over.

I started around the taxi, headed for Sadie's to call the police. When I came around it, Harry caught me. He was no match for a trained dancer. I stomped on his foot, kicked his other shin, and took off—right into the arms of one of the gorillas. When I tried to stomp on his foot he lifted me off the ground with one arm, the other hand over my mouth.

He squeezed my face so hard I could scarcely breathe. He carried me to his car. Harry and the other big man put Justo in the taxi.

We drove in both cars out of Reno, out towards Lovelock. Then on a side road, far into the desert country. Nobody there. No houses—at least, none with lights. No cars. The taxi turned off the road. Then they focused the headlights of the car I was in on the taxi's gas tank and fooled around with it. Draining it. No gas. So Justo couldn't drive back to Reno when he came to.

Harry hadn't said much on the way out. The little he said, I wouldn't answer. But now he put on the sweet helpful-guy act. "This is for your own good, kid, you don't want to get tied up with a flock of sheep, a smart city kid headed for big time like you. Listen, honey, we were a little rough tonight, but you're hard to convince. I've been trying to tell you, not only do I go for you, but my boss—well, you'd be surprised how much he's had his eye on you. You're what he wants. And believe me, he usually gets what he wants. He has a lot of investment in this state, he knows a lot of big people. You be nice to him, kid, you play your cards right, and the state's yours."

I kept thinking, so this is how it's done—this is how a punk kid like me gets a rich man. Through the back door. Roughed up. Pawed at. Slammed around. All I'd thought about before was finding a rich husband. A husband. Vague, with no hands, like a man in a dream.

I wanted to say, to hell with you and your boss. But with those three men in the car, with no room to run or kick, and out on a lonely desert road, and with Justo knocked out—forget it! So I just sat there, quiet, waiting.

They drove back, fast. Stopped in Sparks. It looked like we might be back of a bar, on the edge of town. Harry went inside. He came back, smiling like a nice old uncle going to give his niece a Teddy bear. "The boss'll be out at his place right away. So we'll go out there and talk things over. Wait till you see the fancy layout he's got. Out at the edge of the mountains."

My God! Then, later, maybe dropped over the side of a cliff! I opened my mouth to scream. And got it clamped shut. Harry's smile tightened. No Teddy bear. "Listen, kid, get some sense. You're an orphan. No family. Sadie told me she was playing guardian for you. So there's nobody but Sadie and your landlady to ask any questions about you. Sadie's washed her hands of you. And your landlady will think you skipped town like a lot of kids do who hit Reno. Just nobody, but nobody, to ask questions about you. So why don't we play it happy. And healthy."

So this is the way you get rich?

I began to gag. The hand on my mouth loosened. I gagged, and retched. "Hell!" Harry said. "Get her out on the ground!"

One of the big men opened the door and lifted me out. He held my shoulders. I bent over, retching, jerking against his hands. His hands eased. When they were slack enough I sprang forward, ran towards the alley, screeching every step.

I felt something hit the back of my head . . .

When I came to, we were turning into a driveway. Somewhere. Scrub trees were all around, sprinkled with a few big ones. We stopped at a big dark house, with only a few lights showing. We went in.

It was really swank in a rich log-cabiny style, but my head hurt too much for me to pay much attention. They led me to a room towards the back with mountain lion heads, elephant tusks, tiger skins all over. Everything dead. The fattest man I ever saw was sitting in a big chair. A fat man with a face like a wicked old cherub with beady black eyes.

He stood up and waddled over to me. He could see I had been roughed up. In a gentle voice so cold it made my spine turn to ice he told them what bums they were. Then he spoke to me in that same soft icy voice—I felt if I heard it long enough it might hypnotize me—told me to sit down, not to be afraid.

Suddenly there was a drink in front of me. I shook my head. Harry said, "This kid doesn't drink."

The fat man gently told me how much he admired that.

Then there was a cup of coffee in front of me.

I finally talked. "I won't touch it, and I won't talk with them—" pointing to Harry and the other two—"in the room."

So the nice fat man lovingly told them to get the hell out.

I sat there for a minute or so, long enough for Harry and the men to get good and gone. I smiled at the fat man, and he smiled back. Then I threw the hot coffee in his face, grabbed my shoe, and hit him on the head with its heel. Hard. Remember, there was a metal tap on the heel.

He sputtered at the coffee, ready to yell. I hit him again. I don't know how many times I hit him. His head was bleeding all over the leather sofa that he fell on. He lay still. Then he moved, and I hit him again. After that, he stayed still.

I took off my other shoe, opened a window, and climbed out. My stockinged feet only made a whisper of sound over the rocks and brush. The dark was more solid now, like it gets just before it turns light in the morning. It was hard to find my way, especially since I didn't know where my way was. I didn't feel particularly tired—only like nothing, but nothing, mattered much any more.

The sky began to lighten and I found my way to a clear place, no big trees, only scrub. In the distance I could see the lights of Reno. So I knew in which direction I needed to walk. I walked and walked.

When the sun was up I saw the highway, twisting down a slope. And I heard a motor, a heavy motor, too loud for a passenger car. Then on a curve above me I saw a truck headed the way I wanted to go. I ran out on the road and flagged it. And man, oh man, did the driver ever have a ball ribbing me about having to walk home. So.

But he was nice. He let me off where I told him, a block from my room. I click-clacked home in my tap shoes, took a bath, and packed.

It was the craziest thing. Harry died. Just a few days after his boss went to the hospital with some injuries—head injuries, they were, which he had suffered while walking around his mountain property and falling to a ledge. His employees had found him down there. He was recovering.

What made it so crazy about Harry dying was what was a guy like Harry doing out on the desert? Looking for gold? A city guy like him, surrounded by all the money in the world in that gambling club? But you never can tell what wild ideas a city man can get about the wide open spaces.

The Basque shepherders who found Harry felt bad about him. Because their sheep camp wasn't far away from the spot they found him—just far enough away so that Harry couldn't see it. If Harry had only known it, they said, he could have walked in a straight line, gone over to the camp, and got food and water. But he kept walking in circles. He must have got some foolish notion to take a hike in the desert, simply gone too far and couldn't find his way back. There were no car tracks around. What a walk the guy must have had! No wonder he got dizzy and started walking in circles.

Another thing that confused the reporter and the investigators, why did Harry keep walking, walking, instead of sitting down and taking it easy? He had worn a circle into the ground like he was a merry-go-round. And his feet were bloody, he'd finally taken his shoes off.

The Sheriff's men did find a few spent bullets here and there beyond the circle Harry had made. But not a mark on Harry. So they figured the bullets were left by some hunter taking pot shots at rabbits. The simple fact was, the crazy guy walked himself to death.

I read about Harry and his boss in the papers. Down in Sacramento. I'm carhopping down there at a hamburger joint. Out the opposite direction from the Reno highway.

Just in case Justo's taxi might pop by sometime. Justo holds tight to an idea once he gets on it.

Really, Justo was sweet. And I can't forget those eyes. But gee, all those sheep, three hundred with wool for me to shear.

Besides, I get to thinking about that big hot lonely desert. If a person ever had to leave that sheep camp on foot, and got going in all those circles—

What I think I'll do, as soon as I save up enough money, I'll head for Florida. Not by bus. On an airplane. Fly right over Nevada.

ELLERY QUEEN'S 1971 ANTHOLOGY FALL-WINTER EDITION

$1.50 per copy

ELLERY QUEEN'S ANTHOLOGY DEPT. DP-20
229 PARK AVE. SOUTH/NEW YORK, N.Y. 10003

Please send me _____ copies of ELLERY QUEEN'S 1971 ANTHOLOGY
Volume 22. I am enclosing $1.25 plus 25¢ postage and handling for each copy.

Name _____ (Please print)

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip Code _____

a NEW Miss Phipps story by

PHYLLIS BENTLEY

Miss Phipps detects again! Miss Marian Phipps—in the great 'tec tradition of spinster sleuths (and what an Old Maids Club she and Hildegard Withers and Jane Marple and others would make!).

You know the way fictional detectives, especially the amateurs, literally attract crimes. They can't go anywhere or do anything without bumping into a mystery crying out for investigation. In this instance Miss Phipps is simply visiting her niece, on the occasion of Miss Phipps giving a talk to the Laire Women's Luncheon Club, when a strange burglary occurs—and, of course, Miss Phipps cannot resist making discreet inquiries...

MISS PHIPPS IS TOO MODEST

by PHYLLIS BENTLEY

Clara, the cherished housekeeper of Miss Phipps's niece, rushed into Miss Phipps's bedroom. That the housekeeper had just arrived for the morning's work was evident, for she still wore her outdoor coat. Her face was pale, her eyes and mouth were wide-open.

"Miss Phipps, Miss Phipps!" she shouted. "There's a window broken in the kitchen and your brief case thrown down and open on the floor of the study and two drawers of Mr. Dyer's desk pulled open and Mrs. Dyer's cashbox gone! And papers all over the floor! I think we've been burgled," she concluded in a quieter tone.

"Good heavens!" exclaimed Miss Phipps, alarmed. "I'll come right down."

She extracted her limbs from the blankets, put on her bathrobe and her spectacles, and hurried downstairs.

"Why must they burgle the house now?" she complained angrily to herself. "Why wait till there's only myself and my small possessions here to steal?"

©1971 by Phyllis Bentley.

The situation was indeed embarrassing, for she felt responsible and somehow guilty.

She had come to Northshire the previous day, Thursday, to address the Laire Women's Luncheon Club today and was to stay the weekend with her niece Ruth, who now lived in an agreeable Seventeenth Century house in a village just outside the city. The first few hours of her stay had gone pleasantly. Ruth's husband, Michael Dyer, was now reasonably prosperous; their son Stephen was attending Laire University and earning very good grades; their daughter Pam, once a delicate mite, now a bouncing jolly girl, enlivened Laire Comprehensive School and was popular if not clever. Then suddenly, late Thursday afternoon, a telegram had been phoned in from Michael's sister, who lived in a Northshire seaside resort with their invalid mother, to say that old Mrs. Dyer was extremely ill and wished to see Michael, Ruth, Stephen, and Pam at once.

Michael had groaned. "I don't believe a word of it."

"No, dear," Ruth had agreed. "But we shall be obliged to go to her all the same."

She had raised her eyebrows meaningly at Miss Phipps, who understood that old Mrs. Dyer was "that kind" of mother, and had to be propitiated.

"If you ever see me beginning to behave like that to Stephen, put your foot down firmly," Ruth had said privately to her aunt, while packing.

"I will," said Miss Phipps.

"You don't mind being left alone for a night or two, do you, Aunt Marian?" Ruth asked anxiously.

"Certainly not," Miss Phipps reassured her.

"Mrs. Hoyle will look after you."

"A pleasure," said Clara—Mrs. Hoyle—beaming.

So the Dyers had packed up and left, tucking themselves into the car without more agitation and discussion than seemed natural. Clara had fed Miss Phipps an agreeable small dinner by the study fire, then washed up and gone home.

In point of fact, Miss Phipps was glad to have a little quiet time to herself, for she was tired and nervous about Friday's lecture. On Wednesday afternoon she had spent a distressing hour with an old friend named Marjorie (best not to give her full name), a writer whom Miss Phipps thoroughly respected and loved. Marjorie was unmarried, and all too evidently nearing the end of her life. Their talk was interrupted by an attack of the kind to which Marjorie was too often subject nowadays, and Miss Phipps had to leave on the purse's command, with a painful premonition of farewells unsaid. Early Thursday, Miss Phipps had barely drunk her morning tea when a London newspaper phoned her, demanding an obituary. It seemed that Marjorie had died during the night.

"I'm afraid I haven't all the dates and titles of her books at hand," faltered Miss Phipps.

"We have those. All we want is a personal appreciation, a hundred words or so, from you. Telephone it," commanded the newspaper.

One hundred words did not sound like many, but by the time Miss Phipps had decided what she should say and what she should not say, written it and corrected it and telephoned it, she had quite a rush to catch the train to Northshire. Snatching her morning mail and other papers in a hurry, she discovered in the train that she had left her lecture notes behind, and had to recompose them. She did this with some trouble, then read her letters rather casually—including a most pathetic, scrawled note from Marjorie in a barely legible envelope—finishing this task just before she reached Laire station.

Accordingly, Miss Phipps, enjoying a welcome rest, was dozing Thursday evening in Michael's study, after the Dyer family had left, when she was awakened by a loud untidy knocking at the front door. She stumbled up, put on the porch light, unlocked the door, and confronted two pleasant-faced schoolgirls. One wore very long fair hair; the other had an elaborate arrangement of puffs.

Miss Phipps felt saddened. In her youth, long hanging hair and elaborate puffs were regarded as symbols of female oppression, and she had engaged in a considerable war with her mother in order to be allowed to sport the short hairdo then considered avant-garde. And now all that liberty had been exchanged for these age-old—considered so new—chains. But, of course, if she had been entitled to wage war on the old generation about hairdos, so were these young things. So she smiled at them kindly. The girls giggled and asked if they could see Pam.

"I'm afraid not. Pam's grandmother is ill and they have all gone off to see her."

"Oh, what a pity!" said Long Hair, shaking her silky locks in a manner which showed much practise.

"Could I give Pam a message?" said Miss Phipps.

Schoolgirls' heads were shaken. "We shall see her at school tomorrow."

"Would you care to leave your names?"

Heads were shaken again.

"Are you Pam's mother's aunt?" inquired Puffs.

Miss Phipps nodded.

"We're sorry to have troubled you. We just wanted to ask Pam—" began Long Hair.

"Never mind," said Puffs quickly. Obviously the frustrated communication referred to a boyfriend, thought Miss Phipps.

"Well, we're sorry to have troubled you," repeated Long Hair.

They gave Miss Phipps a look which reduced her short gray curls and neat dark frock to absurdity. Miss Phipps made an effort and smiled at them kindly again as she closed the door, and heard them giggling as they passed down the drive.

Miss Phipps at once retired to her bedroom.

She had just settled comfortably when another loud knock thudded on the front door.

Miss Phipps sighed, disentangled herself from the bed-clothes, climbed slowly out of bed, drew on slippers and bathrobe, descended the stairs, put on the hall and porch lights, turned the key, and opened the door.

A slender dark young man stood before her. He was bearded, side-burned and mustached in the modern fashion, and while not quite deserving comparison with a sheepdog, was yet sufficiently ambushed in hair to make Miss Phipps sigh.

"If one could see his face he would be good-looking," she reflected. "Yes?" she said aloud.

"I was wondering if Stephen—" he began.

"Stephen's away. They are all away. Old Mrs. Dyer is ill and they have gone to see her."

"What a pity. I'm sorry to disturb you so late," said the young man. Unforgivably at this point he giggled.

Miss Phipps, who was well aware she looked antique in a pale fluffy blue bathrobe that was rather too tight for her, in pale blue slippers, long lace-trimmed nightdress, out of date spectacles and fuzzy hair, was strongly tempted to tell him she knew as well as he did that she was a figure of fun to his generation. She refrained, however, and saying coldly, "Good night," she closed and locked the door and turned out the light. She then repented of this act, which was not devoid of malice, and putting on the porch light again, opened the door.

"Hi! You!" she called. "Shall I give Stephen a message? What name?"

"It doesn't matter," said the young man, disappearing round the corner of the porch. He giggled again, uncontrollably, and this time the porch light went out for good.

It had been an irritating experience, and Miss Phipps took some time to throw it off and settle into sleep.

And now there was this—Clara in hysterics and the house burgled during the night! But how could any burglar have entered the house? The doors were locked; all the windows were of the narrow mullioned type and firmly secured on the inside.

"He broke one," explained Clara, showing her a shattered window in the kitchen.

"He must have very narrow shoulders to get in that way," observed Miss Phipps.

"And why not?" demanded Clara, indignant if illogical. "He's made mess enough."

The study certainly was a mess. Papers lay thick and disorderly all over the floor. Two drawers had been pulled from Michael's desk and turned upside down. The top of the desk stood open. Miss Phipps's brief case lay empty on the settee, its lock wrenched off.

"Mrs. Dyer's cashbox is gone," mourned Clara.

"Cashbox?"

"She always kept the house-keeping money in her cashbox, in Mr. Dyer's top right-hand drawer," explained Clara. "Her mother and her grandmother kept it that way, and what was good enough for them was good enough for her, she used to say."

Miss Phipps, though tired and shaken, retained her composure. She sat down and phoned the police. Two stalwart men arrived promptly, and noted down such details as were available in the absence of the Dyers. They were followed by a technician who, with powder and camera, took fingerprints on many surfaces and then asked permission to take their own. This new experience, relished by Miss Phipps, was resented by Clara.

"That's a good print," said the technician jovially about a thumbprint of Clara's. "Be careful you don't steal anything, now, or we shall have you, sure as fate."

"He shouldn't insult me like that," exclaimed Clara angrily. "Me steal anything! The idea!"

"He was only joking, Clara," soothed Miss Phipps.

"He's no need to joke with me," said the incensed Clara.

"Look, Mrs. Hoyle," said the fingerprint man with exemplary patience, demonstrating as he spoke. "These instant photographs are of prints I have lifted, as we say, from Miss Phipps's brief case. Compare this with this—it obviously belongs to Miss Phipps."

"Why not?" said Clara, unpropitiated.

"And this is yours."

"I don't deny it—I took the brief case from Miss Phipps when she came in and put it on this table," said Clara, a hint of tears beginning to sound in her voice.

"And whose is this, then?"

"How should I know?"

"It might be the thief's," suggested the man gravely.

"That's no use till you've caught the thief," said Clara defiantly, determined not to be impressed. "It might be one of the Dyers' anyway—though I don't think any of them touched it," she conceded.

This discussion was fortunately interrupted by the return of all four Dyers.

"You're back! So soon!" exclaimed Miss Phipps.

It seemed that Oona—Oona was Mr. Dyer's sister—denied having sent Michael any telegram. And besides, old Mrs. Dyer wasn't ill.

"But how extraordinary!" exclaimed Miss Phipps.

"Not really, Miss Phipps," said Clara, rapidly making instant coffee for all. "You don't know old Mrs. Dyer. She'd do anything to drag Mr. Dyer to her side, she would."

At last the house grew calm. Coffee was gulped, a quick breakfast eaten, details were furnished—Ruth unluckily had visited the bank that afternoon, and £50 in notes had been in the vanished cashbox. Miss Phipps thought she perceived in the police reaction that this sum was not considered very large, but to the Dyers it was certainly too large a sum to lose.

"Have you missed anything, Aunt Marian?" asked Ruth.

"I think not. I don't really know. There were papers and letters in my brief case. They seem to be all here. My money was in my purse, and my purse was upstairs. I don't really remember."

"Good."

Michael now rushed off to his mill, taking Pam and Stephen with him to be dropped off at suitable points for school and university.

"Aunt Marian, I simply must go out and do some shopping. Will you come with me or stay here?"

"I think I'll stay here—I have to speak at lunchtime, remember, and I'm still rather flustered and confused."

"I'll come back for you at twelve prompt."

Ruth left, and Miss Phipps sat down thankfully and opened the morning paper.

"Miss Phipps, Miss Phipps!" shouted Clara from the garden.

"What now?" murmured Miss Phipps, running out to her. "What's the matter, Clara?"

"Just look at this," urged Clara, leading her to the compost heap by the back gate. "Surely that's a corner of Mrs. Dyer's cashbox? There—sticking out of those leaves."

Miss Phipps stooped. Yes, the object was undoubtedly a cashbox. She pulled it out of the surrounding rubbish. Its hinged lid fell open in her hands. The box was full of pound notes. Clara and Miss Phipps stared at each other in astonishment and alarm. Clara was pale, and Miss Phipps felt pale, too.

"We'd better count them," said Miss Phipps hoarsely.

They went indoors and did so. There were exactly £50.

"Perhaps he was afraid they could be traced," suggested Miss Phipps.

"What, one-pound notes? Phooey," said Clara practically. "But it's odd he didn't grab a few."

Miss Phipps thought it very odd.

She telephoned the police. But she did not reach the men who had visited the house, and those who now received the news sounded uninterested.

"I wish Ruth were here," she thought; as she did not know where Ruth was, she considered telephoning Michael and then decided to visit him in person.

A considerable noise of looms came from the weaving shed next door. Miss Phipps could remember a time when that noise—and therefore Michael's income—was very much smaller, and she rejoiced in the increased prosperity that the clacking shuttles indicated. Michael, however, coming out of his office, advanced on her with a slightly reserved expression which Miss Phipps understood exactly. To be interrupted by an old aunt in the middle of a weekday morning was not a businessman's idea of bliss. She smiled affectionately on him, trying to atone for her interruption by her expression.

"And what can I do for you, Aunt Marian?" said Michael politely.

"It's about the burglary," said Miss Phipps.

"Oh, don't let it worry you," said Michael soothingly. "We shall get most of the money back from our insurance, and it wasn't that much anyway."

"You will get none of the money back," said Miss Phipps in a stern tone designed to awaken him from his business preoccupations.

"Oh?"

"Because you haven't lost any."

"I don't quite understand. Police cutting up rough, are they?"

"No. Ruth's cashbox was found by Clara an hour ago, in the compost heap."

"The thief went out that way, I suppose, by the back gate and threw the empty cashbox away as he went."

"No doubt. But the cashbox wasn't empty. It was full of notes."

"What?"

"Fifty pounds exactly. Just the sum Ruth withdrew from the bank in the afternoon."

"Well, that's good. That's splendid," said Michael, beaming.

"You don't think it's a little odd?"

"Odd? Why odd? I suppose the thief was interrupted—disturbed by some noise or something of that kind. Alarmed, he just threw the box away and hopped it. Escaped while the going was good."

"The cashbox was rather well buried in the compost."

"Clara probably did that when she found the box."

"I don't see how."

"Well, excuse me, Aunt Marian, but I'm rather busy this morning. There's the telephone again," cried Michael, turning aside with a harassed expression. "Have a talk with the police about it if you're not satisfied."

"I will," said Miss Phipps.

The more she thought about the unmercenary thief the odder she felt he was. Why break into a house, tear open drawers, empty a brief case, scatter papers over the floor, discover an old-fashioned cashbox full of money, rush off with it, and then throw the cashbox with the money onto a compost heap? It made no sense. Unless of course, as Michael suggested, the thief had been alarmed, disturbed. By whom, then? And surely it was quicker to keep the box under his arm as he ran than to take time to bury it in a rubbish heap?

"The only conclusion I can come to is that he did not want the money," mused Miss Phipps.

She drove off in the direction of the school which Pam attended. There was a hush, an air of concentration, about the huge multi-windowed building which intimidated Miss Phipps.

"They are in the middle of a lesson period," she deduced correctly.

Daunted but determined, she rang a bell, was received by a secretary, and ushered into the headmistress's office.

Miss Welbeck, in a neat gray suit, with dark smooth hair touched with gray, was pleasing, tasteful, and well-groomed in appearance; she was also courteous, even affable, but firm.

"I fear that to withdraw Pam from the classroom at this moment would arouse a good deal of inquisitive comment. Could you be more precise as to your purpose?"

Miss Phipps described the burglary and the finding of the full cashbox. Miss Welbeck was silent for a moment, then frowned.

"The circumstances do appear unusual, almost strange."

"So they do."

"What is your thought on the matter?"

"The thief did not want the money."

"Perhaps it was too small a sum to interest him."

"Possibly. Or possibly he may have wanted something else."

"Miss Phipps, I am too well aware of your reputation as a writer to take any suggestion of yours lightly"—she doesn't read detective stories, thought Miss

Phipps at once—"but I must ask what do you think the thief was after?"

"Some paper perhaps."

"What kind of paper?"

Miss Phipps colored, coughed, and at length managed to get out, "A paper of examination questions, perhaps?"

"You suspect Pam of harboring such a paper?"

"Some other girl might have pushed such a paper into her schoolbag."

"Dear Miss Phipps, let me set your mind at rest. The summer-term examinations here have come and gone. Our examinations are over for the year. No paper of examination questions would have the slightest value now."

"I am delighted to hear it," said Miss Phipps happily. "It was just that two girls from your school came to see Pam last night, you see."

"Ah."

"And a young man from the university came to see Stephen."

"Ah."

There was a slight difference in the tone of this second comment which made Miss Phipps pause.

"And the Laire University examinations? They will be over, too?"

"That's not for me to say, but I should judge so. I am orry to disappoint you in your detective investigation, Miss Phipps," continued Miss Welbeck, rising, "but on the other and I cannot regret that Laire's comprehensive is not involved in any transaction with an examination paper."

"I share your view wholeheartedly," returned Miss Phipps, courteous if untruthful.

She left and drove off to the university.

Here she encountered an obstinate junior porter, an obstinate senior porter, several obstinate secretaries, and one or two persons of higher rank and similar determination. Suddenly this obstinacy yielded and vanished away, and she found herself in the presence of the vice Chancellor, who could not have been more charming.

"I enjoy your books, Miss Phipps," he said. He named the best and remarked that he hoped there would be a new book soon.

"I'm afraid you may think my errand a foolish one, Sir Desmond," said Miss Phipps, blushing.

Sir Desmond smiled affably. "In fact, I'm afraid it is a foolish one," admitted Miss Phipps.

Sir Desmond, smiling even more affably, said he considered this a stimulating opening. "Every listener would at once wish to know more. Please go on."

Miss Phipps described Ruth and Michael, Stephen and Pam, the telegram, their departure, the arrival of the two school-girls and the undergraduate, and the strange behavior of the burglar.

"Of course he might have been disturbed. But another hypothesis is equally tenable: he scorned the money and was looking for something else," said Sir Desmond in a tone of interest.

"Exactly."

"He took the cashbox to camouflage his real intention."

"Just so."

"He may even have wished you to know he scorned the money—conceit, you know. However, that is perhaps going a little too far; we do not know the thief well enough to judge. What was your first guess as to the identity of the desired object?"

"I blush to say that my first guess at identification was an examination paper. But Miss Welbeck assures me that her end-of-term examinations are over."

"It is the same with us," said Sir Desmond. Observing Miss Phipps's downcast appearance he said kindly, "My dear Miss Phipps, you are taking altogether too modest a view of this affair. Doesn't it strike you that the desired paper was probably one of your own?"

"I have nothing of value," said Miss Phipps.

"A holograph manuscript, perhaps?"

"You are too kind."

"I should pursue that line of investigation, if I were you," said Sir Desmond. "Have some coffee."

"At any rate," said Miss Phipps, brightening as the secretary offered her a steaming cup, "the incident will probably furnish me with a plot for a detective story."

"Just so," said Sir Desmond, beaming. "Please let me know if anything further happens."

"I should hesitate to trouble you," said Miss Phipps.

"But my dear Miss Phipps, I am dying of curiosity," said Sir Desmond.

Miss Phipps, cheered, drove rapidly home, dressed, and in her blandest tones delivered an admirable address to the Laire Women's Luncheon Club.

Three months later she sat at luncheon in a fashionable London restaurant with her literary agent, who had also been Marjorie's. Writers, agents, publishers, TV producers, film stars, and large rich-looking men who financed these various affairs of the arts drifted by, greeting Miss Phipps's agent with varying degrees of affability. A good-looking, very slim young man, almost clean-shaven, gave him the merest nod and hurried on.

"I can't remember who that is," said Miss Phipps casually.

"Oh, you know him? He is Marjorie's nephew, her sole beneficiary and executor."

"I've seen him somewhere, think. Nice lad?"

"Thorough scoundrel. Eaten up with conceit, too."

"Oh, dear! Well, poor Marjorie left nothing much for him to play with."

"Only her papers, her letters, her manuscripts. But a very handsome offer has come for them from an American university. However, that lad is going to accept three times the sum from one of the newspaper millionaires," said the agent, refraining from using a descriptive adjective.

Miss Phipps gazed at him perplexed.

"Marjorie," he continued carefully, "was, as you know, a very beautiful woman in her youth. Discreet scholar handling would be most advisable."

"But surely she placed some time limit on the printing of her personal letters?" exclaimed Miss Phipps, suddenly remembering her own early days.

"Alas, no. At the end—well, rything happened very ckly. She died that night, day before you traveled to rthshire, you remember."

"We are in for a nasty ndal, then."

There was a pause.

"Have you noticed any signs mental decay in me lately?" uired Miss Phipps.

"None."

His coolness reassured her.

"That last night Marjorie te me a letter—the merest awl, but signed and refore, I think, not to be lected—asking me to be one her executors. I received it morning after I last saw her. eard nothing more of it, so I ched no importance to the tter."

"But, my dear Marian!" d her agent, delighted. "This splendid! This will put a ke in that young man's eel! An informal letter of t kind will have no legal dity, of course, but—"

"It might cause the nephew ie worry?"

"It will certainly cause orjorie's solicitor a scruple or two. And I'll take pains to see that it does. Where is the letter?"

"That young man stole it," said Miss Phipps, glum.

"That is a great pity. But how could he have stolen the letter, once you had received it?"

Miss Phipps described the burglary, in some detail. "Marjorie must have told him about the letter after she had written it to me, that night."

"But how could he have known where you were?"

"The porter at my flat had my address."

"And Stephen's name?"

"Anyone in the village would tell him Stephen's name and address. Oh, the burglar was that nephew all right—he's slim-shouldered enough to have got through that narrow window, and of course he'd disguised himself with beard, sideburns, and mustache. However," said Miss Phipps, suddenly brightening, "we have his fingerprints, you know."

"A very useful means of persuasion," said the agent with satisfaction.

When our Managing Editor finished reading the manuscript of Dennis O'Neil's "Report on a Broken Bridge," she sent the story to us with the following comment: "This has a 'Citizen Kane' quality, and yet an individuality all its own." Our interest was immediately aroused.

Well, you know, our Managing Editor was right on target — she hit the bull's-eye.

If on finishing this story you are not impressed, or worse, if you do not like it, let the story simmer for a while. We think your mind will keep coming back to it again and again . . .

REPORT ON A BROKEN BRIDGE

by DENNIS O'NEIL

It wasn't love or money that drove Otis Belding to his very thorough suicide: it was something bigger, lots bigger, and knowing about it is pushing me toward a premature demise, too.

You know, boss, we might have guessed the why of his death if we'd bothered to think about who he was, where he came from, and especially what he'd accomplished. I'd already completed my investigation by the time I got round to looking at the movies that kid happened to be taking when Belding made his spectacular exit; but as soon as I saw them I knew my guesses were correct. I sniffed an apocalypse.

You're now reading this night letter and you'll never see the prints I've forwarded to the New York office, so I'll give you a preview. Here's what the kid's camera caught:

Background: the Bridge Research search complex. Foreground: lake, placid, dotted with tiny ripples, deep-blue near the shore and powder-blue in the center. In the far distance: the Ozark Mountains. Above: motionless blue, streaked with wisps of white. And around, everywhere: deep-green—leaves that look heavy enough to use as anchors.

Enter Belding, in a sleek shiny aluminum dinghy, rowing to the middle of the water rowing despite a hefty outboard perched on the stern. (At the joint the kid changed to a telescopic lens.) Belding carefully cuts off the end of a long brown cigar, places the gold cigar clipper and severed tip in the pocket of his shirt, puts fire to the cigar with a gold lighter. Draws, exhales, slowly gazes up, down. Then he cautiously edges to the bow and sits on top of the wooden keg: the boat lists, and he has a few bad moments getting balanced. He does, though, and after another long look at the scenery he reaches down with his cigar and calmly pokes a fuse stuck in the keg's side.

© 1971 by Dennis O'Neil.

He sits quietly and I'm pretty sure he's smiling. Sits relaxed as a stone, peacefully smoking. There is a hard red ash and the camera shakes violently, and searches randomly, glimpsing a small army of dogs leaping like dervishes, and then focuses on where Belding had been. He isn't, not anymore. There is only a widening circle of dirty gray in the powder-blue, and a cloudlet of bluish haze crowning a roiling column.

It reminds me of the climax of an arty foreign flick—the end that beats you over the head with Profound Symbolism and in which the director uses the H-bomb mushroom the way a comic strip uses exclamation points.

My favorite headline was on page three of the Daily News, amid human-interest drivel about our Indian Summer heat wave. You remember: Boy Wonder Multimillionaire Ends With a Bang.

Before the ink was dry on that little paradigm of class journalism you had me and my hangover in your office. The air-conditioning was on the blink—again!—and your bald pate was sweat-shiny enough to use as a shaving mirror. You looked like you'd been moldering in a rain forest for a couple of centuries, and coherency was not your strong trait, not that morning. I understood from your sputtering that Otis had done himself in, that the Board had panicked, and that unless we could demonstrate that our late president had shuffled off for reasons unconnected with the affairs of Bridge Enterprises, Inc., our stock certificates would soon be worth something less than bus transfers. I concurred, and hied away to shoot the trouble.

By noon I was aboard an Eastern jet out of Newark, grimly contemplating the early market report in the first edition of the Post: Bridge Enterprises was selling at 31½, down 7 in the first two hours of trading. My wallet ached: I own 300 shares myself.

I picked up a St. Louis paper while waiting for my rent-a-car at Lambert Field: at the day's closing we were selling at 29.

I drove southwest wondering why nobody touts the beauty of that part of the country. There's nothing out here so awesome as the Grand Canyon or as numbingly spectacular as the Rockies, but nonetheless the geography is lovely—soft-edged hills and quiet valleys and lush forests. That land, west of St. Louis, is feminine America, loving and open: maybe if I'd ever found a human equivalent I wouldn't by typing this with a Beretta in my lap.

Ugliness begins about five miles north of Belding's birthplace, a town called Feeley that used to be small and isn't now because our company built a lead-refining plant closeby. Along came Bridge Enterprises and zapped 75 acres of trees and bulldozed 75 acres of grass and filled a stream with pulped garbage, bringing population and prosperity. Belding's gift to his childhood. Swell gift. The stink is so powerful it must have seeped into the soil; the sky is the color of sooty canvas; the buildings are as shocking as tarantulas on a loveseat. Up there in our air-conditioned, pastel-hued headquarters we just don't realize how gruesome the nitty-gritty is.

Feeley itself can't have changed much. Basically it's one square containing a post office, a bar with liquor store attached, an I.G.A. supermarket, a funeral parlor, and a gas station. Sundry other businesses and a scattering of houses border the square, and more are abuilding. I patronized the liquor store, obtained a fifth of my favorite, and the information that one Hap Elsenmeyer had once been Otis Belding's boyhood buddy. I went to see old buddy Hap, owner of the gas station.

Detective fiction is full of scenes in which the amiable private eye loosens the tonsils of suspicious locals with a dram of the barley. No lie, boss. Elsenmeyer is obviously a man familiar with a bottle. I had to merely hint, to sort of wave the bottle nonchalantly. Old Hap told an adolescent to mind the pumps and we retired to his office.

He produced cracked china mugs with the panache of a canny conjuror producing bunnies, and I poured. The room was pleasantly old-fashioned—even had an overhead fan that sort of sloshed the humidity around—and the pungent smel of petroleum was a relief from the lead fumes outside. We opined on the heat, agreed it sure was fierce for November id nitter-nattered our way to lking about Otis.

I won't attempt to transcribe Elsenmeyer's dialect in all its awly splendor. You'll have to e satisfied with the bones of e story he told me.

Otis Belding's real-life Horab Alger saga began with a ook and a worm. The lad was pure genius at finding fishing bles. From age six on he had inches where they'd be biting any given morning, and the inches were always dead-center. That was a useful talent for m, giving him a tot of social ceptance and putting food in s belly. Came fishing time his hoolmates forgave him his pa, e town ne'er-do-well, and his a, the town crazy. During the inter Otis starved and was untent; summers, he ate fresh sh and was grudgingly reected. Elsenmeyer once asked tis how he could be so lding certain, and Otis said e didn't know, he just had ese feelings.

He was, in effect, orphaned the age of ten. His father pired in a ditch one winter ght and the authorities carted s mother off to the county ental hospital, where she died me years later. An aunt did a rfectly rotten job of guardship. Mostly, Otis lived alone a shack near the site of the ture refinery, getting to school now and again, somehow surviving the cold months. Age eleven, he discovered games and took his first hesitant steps toward the Dow Jones Index and a cask of high-grade blasting powder.

A bunch of the good old boys used to meet in the back room of the tavern evenings for cards. Friendly poker, two-bit limit. Otis took to hanging around, probably to escape the cold of the shack. I'm guessing now, but I think he must have swiped some money from his aunt's purse one day and wangled himself a seat at the table. Played smart, according to Elsenmeyer—real smart. Uncanny smart. Walked away with enough dollars to stand beers for the bunch, root beer for himself. Kept out a stake, though, and sat in the following session, and every session thereafter, and won more than he could have made in a whole summer's field laboring. The boys were mildly amazed but, I gather, tolerant. Otis became a pet topic of Feeley conversation.

A trucker named Batson J. Frink ended Otis's poker career: Frink pushed a tractor-trailer rig for a Kansas City outfit and often joined the game when he was passing through. Nobody much liked Frink, but nobody told him, because he was big.

and mean. He was also a sore loser. He lost heavily to Otis on July 4, 1951—Elsenmeyer remembers the date exactly—and didn't enjoy it, not one bit.

He waited for Otis outside the bar while Otis was buying drinks, caught the boy, dragged him behind the building, and beat him mercilessly. Elsenmeyer was a witness; he tells it with a connoisseur's glee—how the trucker punched Otis to blood and bruises, broke a rib, kicked out teeth. Finally Frink was too tired to continue. He paused to catch his breath—and heard his death pronounced.

Sitting against the rear wall, Otis looked up through swollen eyelids and said, "You're going to die tonight." Just those five words, spoken with absolute conviction. Frink must have been shaken by them, because he went to his rig and drove off.

I checked with the Highway Patrol. The official report confirms Hap Elsenmeyer's story. Between 9:00 and 9:15 on the night of July 4, 1951 a tractor-trailer driven by Batson J. Frink was rounding a steep curve eight miles south of Feeley. The load in the trailer apparently shifted, causing the rig to topple off the road, down into a gully, and explode. The cargo of magnesium ingots caught fire. Frink's body was never recovered.

Leaving Feeley, I had my first intimations that our leader had been a hint spool. Then I thought, no, it was only a coincidence. Sure.

The data you supplied led me next to East St. Louis. The records there showed that Belding had resided in a boardinghouse near the Oberlin Nestor bottle factory, which was not any urban gem of the neighborhood, believe you or not. A Mrs. McNally was, and is, the landlady. Picture the dark side of the moon and see McNally—walking crater, this senile citizen, and easily 90% malicious. The remaining 10% praises the memory of Otis Belding.

"A good boy," she insists. "Best boy I ever knew."

To prove the assertion she pointed to a plaster Virgin statue on a doily on a shelf in the parlor. "Bought me that with his first big winnings, Otis did. Mrs. McNally crowed. "Ain't lovely?"

You bet, Mrs. McNally, agreed. Now about the winnings—?

Belding's co-boarder had been a man named Lev Thalier, a wine jockey and dealer of odd jobs at a racetrack, Cahokia Downs. Thalier, it seems, had been a big noise in the twenties. The usual weedy history: he'd lost everything in the '29 crash, cocooned him-le the grape, and never y emerged. Until young appeared, that is.

At the beginning Otis depe his gambling talent—ied the horse forms Thaliert home and had the wino e bets for him. Thalierted that the lad won istently, and he began ing duplicate bets. Thalierted, as did his youthful tor. After a particularly tacular afternoon with the es Thaliert fueled himself champagne—no more Calia port for this ex-tycoon—reminisced, aloud and at h. Dug forth from his k a sheaf of gaudy stock ficates, displayed them to and discoursed regarding market.

is was interested, and . He exhausted Thaliert's and the next morning got rmful of books from the ic library. He spent days ng over the books and the icial sections of local rs and, when he learned of existence, The Wall Street nal. Then he bought iert a new suit and arked on his second and ultiimate career.

The other boarders' eyes bugged when they see old is and Otis come out on the h looking like a bandbox," McNally croaked warmly.

"They go over the bridge downtown and come back with a big envelope. They spread a bunch of papers on the kitchen floor and look at them like they was gold or something. 'We gonna be rich,' Lewis says. Young Otis, he nods his head yes."

Belding stayed at Mrs. McNally's for nine years. Thaliert resurrected dormant expertise in food, drink, music, and in the midst of that slum they lived lavishly. Each Wednesday Thaliert obediently guided a spanking limousine across the bridge and returned bearing a fresh envelope and the grandest largess that St. Louis could provide—records, clothes, prime steaks, bonded bourbon.

"Boarders was green with envy," Mrs. McNally solemnly assured me.

Let it be noted that Belding's appetites extended beyond his stomach, as is normal, and as the gossip columnists have frequently observed. With whom is not relevant, and anyway, you'll have a chance to leer further on in this narrative.

Belding terminated the slum idyll on his twenty-first birthday. He and Thaliert drove across the Eads Bridge for the last time, saw a lawyer, signed papers, and returned to the boardinghouse. At the curb Belding took the wheel, said goodbye to Thaler, and went away without bothering to collect the belongings from his room. Thaler was official owner of $100,000 worth of blue-chip securities; Belding held for himself $600,000 worth of wildly speculative issues.

Thaler's income kept him happily juiced for his remaining half decade: his liver had the privilege of succumbing to only the finest French and Italian vintages.

Our accounting department will confirm that Mrs. McNally still receives a check for $400 every month—more than the old witch deserves.

I won't bore you with my pursuit of the Belding success saga. What you're getting, boss, is pure poetry; if you want prosaic details send another lackey for them. Suffice to say, for a week I relearned what we both vividly know. If you've forgotten any of it read the clippings from Time, Fortune, Forbes, The Wall Street Journal, et al.

Boy Wonder Belding could do no financial wrong: he got rich, richer, damn near richest. Two weeks before the beginning of the great computer boom he bought the software outfit. Two weeks prior to the McDonnell-Douglas merger he bought McDonnell. Two weeks before the Apollo contract were awarded he bought Te Instrument. And two weeks before the start of the season that made camp obsolete as button hooks unloaded that corny television show. The list goes on and like a list of Howard Hughes' fondest dreams.

I'm an investigator, expert snoop, so I snooped thoroughly and relentlessly through the pads in Miami, Newport, and Acapulco; permanent suite in Las Vegas; the yacht; and I disproved my complete satisfaction with the hoary notion that the wealthy can't be happy. Listen, he's happy. Young, healthy, handsome, and able to buy spare anything—a regular bounce bundle of sybaritic joy was Belding. Until last September.

In 1966 he formed Bridges Enterprises and unleashed the world the hokey motto that graces our letterheads: Build Bridges to the Future. Belding believed those words. He was cut from a far more idealistic cloth; he was more than a mass entrepreneur; he actually saw himself and his affairs as a force for progress. Sure, he engineered dirty deals, but he was unique in admitting them, and he had an excellent speech. You remember the speech livered at the convention of the National Association of Manufacturers—the lines quoted all the press releases: “I regret having harmed a few actively innocent parties. I rmed them in order to insure brighter tomorrow for their ildren.”

Horrible speech. Honest sentiment, though. Bear it in mind while I take you to upstate New rk.

I won't give you my impressions of our Hudson river plant: you've already been treated to my description of the Feeley refinery, right? Well, the Hudson facility isn't quite as bad, not quite. A lot of money was spent on landscape smetics.

The manager, Tyrone omas, gave me the grand tour. He's a proud fellow. He talks of extracting detergent phosphates from raw chemicals as a frat brother boasting a conquest. I understood maybe a-tenth of his rap. We finished the tour at the wide ss terrace between the plant and the river. Looking out over Hudson, with the industrial yrinth at my back, I could not forget where I was, except that I felt the vibration drainage pumps through my shoes and saw the churning of the water where the pipes pty into it.

“You can see for yourself this is the finest facility of its kind in the world,” Thomas was saying. “Per diem gross is forty tons. We hope to up that the coming fiscal period.”

“Very impressive,” I said. “Was Mr. Belding pleased?”

“Pleased as Punch. Gave me a bonus, promised another.”

“No problems?”

“None worth talking about. We had some trouble with the radicals at the beginning, but Mr. Belding handled it all right.”

“Radicals?”

Thomas smiled wearily. “Not the card-carrying sort. The dupes. At least, I think they're dupes.”

I asked, “Who exactly are they?”

“The crowd from the university. They did a lot of picketing when we first went into operation. Men with the beards and the hair, girls with the signs and the beads—the whole shebang. It got on the TV news shows.”

“They have something against phosphates?”

“They have something against progress,” Thomas said righteously. “Darn fools. Claimed we were ruining the environment. That's a pile of you-know-what. Look around, judge for yourself. This land was going to waste before Bridge moved in. Nothing here but chipmunks. We pumped millions into the local economy, put five thousand men to work, going to take another two thousand if we get a go-ahead on the new wing. I ask you, is that ruining?"

"Did Mr. Belding do anything about the protests?"

"Oh, sure. He met with 'em on four or five separate occasions. He was a heck of a sight more patient than I'd've been in his position. He volunteered to put in the sod we're standing on and the drainage network underground. Cost a bundle, but they weren't satisfied. They said we're killing fish. Imagine. All that fuss over some fish. Heck-fire, I'd've offered to buy 'em a carload of fish to shut 'em up. Finally Mr. Belding promised to finance a research laboratory and that got rid of the pests."

And it got rid of me, too. I left Thomas to his phosphates and tucked myself into a motel for the night. You're getting nowhere, I told myself sternly, and myself agreed. My notebook and tape recorder were jammed with information, true, but I'd discovered no tidbits absent from Who's Who.

The only thing I had learned was that Otis Belding never—made a financial mistake. I'd always assumed he must have committed a blunder or two along the way, even you and I. He hadn't. Not a blunder. He'd cast his mo remains to the lake breeze w a perfect financial record : although his tranquillity h been infinitesimally marred the Hudson protests, th shouldn't have upset him mu considering that they clued h to the sweetest tax dodge-c public relations coup a m millionaire could wish f Compared to the Bridge : search Center, Carnegie's braries were so many sa boxes: the intellectuals plauded, the I.R.S. condon and the Silent Majority did hear about it, as usual. In sh the Center is another monc nous success.

As I was leaving the m the next morning you pho and told me that the corpor fortunes were improving— were selling over 30 again— you said I should stay with investigation another twer four hours, prepare a docum to exhibit in the ann stockholders' booklet—sh the Bridge Family that th officers care—and bring expense account home. W gone through the motions : that was sufficient. You said.

As it happened, I did nail reason for the suicide withi day, but if I hadn't I wo have hung with the case regardless. Suddenly you didn't seem so almighty impressive, boss; suddenly your wrath held no terrors for me. Nor the loss of my job, either. Conclusion: subconsciously, I had the answer. Or I was on the edge of an inkling—no, in this context, better call it a premonition.

I had two more people to see. Dr. Harold Seabrook, head of the Research Center, would be in Europe until Thursday, his secretary told me long distance. So that left Miss X—Belding's mistress. I'd known about her, of course, as had you and most of the guys in the executive suite. Otis Belding's bucolic lady was the worst kept secret in the company. As acting chief of security I'd made it my business to obtain her name and address; more, I'd run a somewhat-more-detailed-routine check on her—wouldn't do to have Belding victimized by an adventuress, I rationalized. I needn't have worried. Sandra Burkholt is nobody's femme fatale.

Frankly I was curious. What manner of woman, I wondered, would cause a man like Belding to abandon his string of pneumatic starlets, theatrical grandes dames, and society sweethearts? Because abandon them he did—lopped them off like diseased limbs last summer, about the time he established the Research Center. My field personnel said la Burkholt was 32, single, living alone in a small isolated house not far from the Center, and the mother of an illegitimate son. Belding probably met her in November 1968, while she was employed as a typist at the Feeley refinery. It's possible he'd known her earlier, during his miserable childhood.

I arrived at her house at dusk on Wednesday. There was a sports car in the driveway: no other signs of prosperity. On the contrary. A bent rusty tricycle lay on the walk; the grass needed cutting; the house itself needed shingles and paint. Hardly a magnate's love nest.

She answered my knock and led me into the living room. The inside was a perfect reflection of the exterior: shabby furniture, cracked linoleum floor, peeling wallpaper. And Sandra completed the motif. She isn't homely: there are lingering phantoms of an artful feline girl in her bold glance, in her quick sensuous smile. But she's worn. The red hair is stringy and faded, the skin rough, the figure sagging. Had Belding liked his women pitiable? Was it really love?

Feeling strangely like an archeologist prowling an ancient temple, I followed Sandra to the bedroom they had shared and viewed Belding's artifacts: a medium-priced portable phonograph, a mixed collection of records, and the books and magazines he'd read himself to sleep with. Three sorts of reading matter, divided into separate piles. Books on extra-sensory perception, ranging from inexpensive paperbacks to footnotey tomes to science-fiction novels. Stuff on ecology of approximately the same range, including a complete set of Sierra Club publications and a series of pamphlets from Barry Commoner's group at Washington University. And history books, mostly comprehensive texts. I paged through them, to no avail: Belding had not been an underliner.

We went into the kitchen. I unobtrusively turned on my tape recorder while Sandra concocted lemonade. That's right, boss—lemonade. As remarked, Miss Burkholt is not a femme fatale.

"I'll have to ask you to hold down your voice," the tape recorder echoes Sandra as I write. "My boy is sick in the next room there. Generally he's healthy as a horse. Must be one of those viruses."

Me: "I hope he feels better."

Sandra: "Thank you."

Me (hesitantly): "Did you know Mr. Belding well?"

Sandra: "'Course. Not long but well as can be. We were lovers."

Me (embarrassed): "Forgive me for asking—but did he buy you gifts? Did he have an arrangement with you?"

Sandra (chuckling, blessing her): "You mean was I a kept woman? No, sir. Oh, he bought little presents for the house and for my boy. He brought me a mixmaster once, was I think the biggest thing. He never give me money and I didn't ask for any. Didn't expect any. It was purely a man-woman thing with us. I liked him. I believe he liked me. I'll miss my Otis."

Me: "Did you notice any recent change in his behavior?"

Sandra: "He was always-well, odd. Funny, he could be touching you and somehow not be there at all, like he'd left his body behind. Oh, yes, there was one present Otis brought on his last visit I forgot about. He said something strange—"

She was interrupted by thump from behind the wall. We rushed into the boy's cubbyhole. The child was lying in a tangle of quilt beside the bed, breathing in harsh rattling gasps. He was drenched with sweat, his skin wax-white. He wasn't suffering from virus: the kid was dying.

"We'd better get him to hospital," I said.

Sandra wrapped him in the quilt and carried him to my car. I pegged the speedometer needle at 70 most of the distance to the local clinic. The decrepit general practitioner there diagnosed a ruptured appendix and confessed he had no facilities for treating acute peritonitis. I knew a clinic that did—coincidentally, the best medical setup in that area is at the Bridge refinery in Feeley. I got on the phone, chartered a private plane, and alerted one of those bright young specialists the company boasts of recruiting that Sandra and her son were on the way.

At the airfield I gave her my card and asked her to call the office if she or the boy needed anything. She promised she would.

Not being tired yet, I drove into the Ozark foothills, toward the Center. I surrendered to bizarre reflections—bizarre for me, anyway. Not since I'd been an altar boy waiting scared in the musty closeness of the confessional had I contemplated eternity. Maybe it was the country. If there are ghosts, they lurk in those hills, flash briefly, mockingly in headlight glare, and rattle forebodingly in eaves. Or maybe it was simple shame, an attempt to excuse my lack of professionalism. I hadn't seen Sandra earlier, during the Feeley phase of the inquiry, and that oversight had been wasteful, costly. But if I had, then I wouldn't have been there to bully medicos and pilots, and the boy might not have got the attention he needed. I entertained the notion that I served a benevolent destiny. Fate? Predestination? Whose will was my master? Certainly not Belding's.

Bridge Enterprises can be proud of its Research Center. Architecturally it's the best we have: instead of the usual eyesore, the building is dignified—predominantly vertical lines—harmonizing with the surrounding pines. I parked in the visitor's lot and admired the flood-lit scene a bit. A guard demanded to know who I was. Then, miraculously transformed by my credentials, he hefted my bag and escorted me to the VIP quarters. Nice digs. Pastel and Danish plastic modern. Home away from . . .

A shaft of sunlight across my face woke me. I put on my most expensive lightweight suit and a white-on-white shirt-tie combo—to impress the scientific yokel with my Manhattan class.

Huh-uh. I doubt that Dr. Harold Seabrook can be impressed. He's a large chunk of dour impatience—six-six, big-bellied, features drawn as though his jowls were weighted. He doesn't speak: he spews.

We met in the lounge. As we talked he traced tiny precise geometrics on the formica table top in a spilling of iced tea.

"I can give you five minutes," he said brusquely.

I was annoyed. I'm a bigger corporate cheese than Seabrook. "You've got somewhere to go?" I asked.

"I've got to see about saving the human race from itself," he replied, managing not to sound corny. "I won't do it prattling with you."

"Funny," I mused sarcastically. "I read your job description. It said 'ecologist,' not 'messiah.'"

"No difference," he snapped.

Having nary a comeback to that I asked, "What exactly are you doing with the company's money? What's the project?"

He raised a brow. "At the moment? We're seeking a way to reduce the so-called 'greenhouse effect.'"

"You're messing with flow-ers?"

His tone put me back in knee pants and a dunce cap: I was the Second Grade's biggest dumbbo, he the exasperated teacher. He said, "You've noticed the weather? Not enough heat is escaping into space. Pollutants have formed a curtain that traps short-wave radiation near the ground, and the temperature is rising to—"

I interrupted, "I don't need a pee-aitch-dee to tell me it's a hell of a hot November. I'm sure you geniuses will dope out the damndest refrigerator in twenty years and we'll give you either a gold watch or a Nobel Prize, take your choice."

"Many of my colleagues would agree with you," he said with unexpected gentleness. "I do not, and neither did Otis Belding. He had a theory that a critical point will come in our poisoning of Earth, and when it does the planet will simply stop living—stop. All the life-support systems will disintegrate at once, and that will be the end. Finish. No more. We may have a few days, or a few hours, to regret our stupidity."

"That doesn't sound like it makes a lot of sense, Doc."

"I didn't think so either, at first. But I was reasoning conventionally. Then I pursued a line of research that Otis suggested and—" His voice changed: the gentleness was gone. "You've wasted enough of my time."

He pulled a folded memo sheet from his yellow-stained lab jacket. "Otis said I was to give you this."

My name was scrawled on it, in Belding's handwriting.

"Hold it, Doc," I said. "I never met Otis Belding. He didn't even know I exist. You want me to believe he addressed a note to me personally before he died and left it with you? No way."

"Facts are facts," he said, getting up. "Excuse me."

He was gone, that fast, leaving another protest snagged in my throat and a zero limned in cold tea on the table. Vowing to humble him later, I opened the note. It read:

"There's nothing to be done. It is too late. See model in my office."

Signed: Otis Belding.

I obtained the key to his private office from the receptionist, climbed to the top floor, and entered. The room was barren as a Trappist cell—furnishings consisted solely of an army cot and a metal stand on top of which was a scale model of the Eads Bridge. The model was broken. Someone had hit it and broken it in half. It was a bridge that went nowhere.

There was a question yet to be answered. I used a phone in the lobby to call Sandra.

"How's your son?" I asked.

"He's doing nicely. That nice Dr. Benedict said he caught it in time. I want to thank you."

"My pleasure. Sandra, you remember what you were saying? About a present Otis bought?"

"That was the funniest he ever did. It was a gun—a pistol. I still have it, though Lord knows what I'll ever do with a gun. He gave it to me and said, 'If you love your son you'll do him this favor.' I suppose he was joking."

"Could be. 'Bye, Sandra."

I strolled outside and ambled across the sweep of lawn, down to the lake. No hurry, not any more, for me, for you, for anyone. Because it's obvious why Otis Belding killed himself. He had a genius for prophecy, remember? I figure he had premonitions about the future—premonitions that slowly grew to convictions until, two weeks before an event, they became certainties. Once he became aware of something, he could predict its course. He became aware of ecology, he saw the "critical point" coming; he saw his future—our future—and sought refuge with a simple woman and her son; and failing to find comfort he chose to die.

Exactly thirteen days ago he chose to die.

I know how he felt. Like a man standing on a broken bridge.

I have my gun, and I've always hated being the last one out.

So—goodbye, boss.

It was the kind of job that needed a man who was good with a gun...

THIRTEEN

by R. L. STEVENS

Renger looked up from the crude map on the table before him and studied the newcomer with critical eyes. "You're Hallman?"

"That's right."

"They tell me you're a good man with a gun."

"I get by."

"Then I guess you're the man we need for this job. Ever used an automatic carbine?"

"Plenty of times."

"Like this one?" Renger asked, bringing out a new Plainfield carbine—very much like the standard military weapon. "It uses thirty-shot clips. All right?"

"Fine." Hallman glanced around at the five other men in the room. The only one he knew was Asmith, a part-time heroin pusher who'd been in and out of prison. He nodded to him and waited for Renger to introduce the others.

"That's Crowthy and Evans and Asmith and Galliger and Yates. A damn good team for this job. But we needed a good man with a gun—somebody who's not afraid to use it."

"That's me," Hallman said. He had earned the reputation

"Good! We'll have smoke bombs and stuff, but I'm not kidding myself that we're going to get in there without killing few people."

"What about guards?" Hallman asked. "And patrol cars?"

Renger pushed back his graying hair and stabbed at the map with a pencil. "The only guard you need to worry about is right here. Take him out and it's smooth sailing. Now, patrol car comes down this street about once every hour. We're timed to miss it, but we can't be sure. All I can tell you is that Crowthy here will be covering you from across the street. If the patrol car surprises us, you'll have to deal with it."

"I understand," Hallman said.

"Your job is to take out the guard, get into the place, and fire a few shots. Create confusion. Make them thin © 1971 by R. L. Stevens.

"We've got a whole army out here. Then I'll toss a few smoke bombs and the rest of us will love in."

Asmith spoke up from his corner. "What about the getaway?"

"We'll leave the truck at this point and go the rest of the way on foot. Afterwards each of you will have to get back to the truck on your own. Evans will stay with the truck as a lookout. But at ten o'clock we'll all out. Anyone not back to the truck by ten, we figure they're caught. Any questions?"

As they went over the plan step by step, Hallman found his attention wandering. He was 24 years old, and already he had the reputation of being good with a gun. Anyone who bothered to check his record would know he was equally good with a knife. The first man he'd ever killed had been with a knife, and he still remembered the expression of shock in the man's eyes as Hallman's blade slid deep between his ribs.

That was the way it had been the other times, too, though he remembered that just one best of all. Sometimes he had not even seen the men he'd killed. They'd merely been figures to be gunned down at a distance, or sometimes men to be blown up in their beds by a well-tossed bomb. And people knew that Hallman was an expert. They came to Hallman when the killing had to be neat and swift and efficient.

"All right," Renger said. "It's set, then. We go at dawn."

The men nodded silently and left the room. There was very little conversation, and Hallman was glad of that. He was not much of a talker.

The early morning was usually best for a job of this sort, Hallman had discovered. It was especially good if you could hit a place just a few minutes before eight, when people were arriving for the day's work. The patrol cars were generally off the road then, too, changing crews for the day tour.

This morning was especially good, because a light mist from the river hung over the streets of the town. Evans had parked the truck an hour earlier, and they'd come the rest of the way on foot, moving singly to avoid attracting attention. The town was quiet, with only a few people moving about, when Hallman poked his head around a tree across the street from their target.

The first thing he saw was the uniformed guard by the gate. He seemed to know everyone who entered, though occasionally he glanced at a pass when it was held out to him. The holstered revolver at his side presented no difficulty to Hallman, who could have, if necessary, killed the man from across the street.

Hallman broke from cover and walked directly toward the guard, carrying the carbine casually in his left hand, pointed at the ground. The man didn't notice him until he was almost up to him, and then the guard's hand dropped uncertainly to the holstered revolver. "You need a pass here," he said. "A pass."

Hallman smiled and kept walking toward the man, as if he didn't understand the language. When he was close enough he brought his right arm up quickly to the guard's throat, plunging his knife deep into the flesh. The man went down with the gurgling sound they always made. Already, before the guard hit the ground, Hallman swung his automatic carbine up to cover the doorway ahead of him, and that was almost a fatal mistake.

From behind him he heard Crowthy shout a warning, and he whirled to see the patrol car traveling fast down the street. They'd already spotted him and screeched to a stop. Crowthy fired a quick wild shot and retreated toward the woods. Two officers jumped out of the car and one of them fired three rapid shots at Crowthy's retreating back. Hallman saw him topple in the dirt as Hallman brought his own weapon up. He fired a quick burst, dropping one officer in his tracks as the other dived behind the patrol car. A third man, the driver, started out his side and then fell back, bleeding from the shattered windshield.

Hallman moved backward into the building, firing as he went, and saw the second officer fall over. Then he was inside, running down a dingy hallway, ramming another 30-shot clip into the weapon. He hoped the others would be coming soon.

A man appeared ahead of him at the end of the passage, like a pop-up target in a shooting gallery, and Hallman sprayed him with bullets. Then he ran on, into the first room, firing quick shots to clear the way. He'd got the rhythm of it now, the half-forgotten feel for killing that left him at times but always returned.

In the second office a screaming woman was hunched in one corner, covering her face. Hallman paused only an instant, and then fired a short burst into her body. She slid down the wall, torn and bleeding and already without life. She was the first woman he'd ever killed, and he was surprised at how little it bothered him.

He smashed out the window in a front room, seeking the others, and saw two more uniformed guards running around the front of the building. He fired fast, cutting them both down with a line of bullets across their backs. Then he saw the others break from the cover of the trees. Renger was in the lead, running with his gun ready, and he hurled a smoke bomb as he crossed the road. Then someone on the floor above cut loose with three quick shots and Hallman saw Yates stagger and go down in the street, just before the smoke obscured him.

Hallman found the stairs and started up. A figure appeared at the top and let go with the rest of the clip. Before he could reload, a second man fell on him with a roar, toppling him backward halfway down the steps. He felt the carbine slide away from him, but he rolled over and managed to get his knife out. He plunged it into the fleshy man's side, heard his grunt of pain, and plunged it again. The man went suddenly limp, and Hallman rolled his body down the stairs.

There was shooting below him now, and he knew Renger and the others were past the gate. He made it the rest of the way to the top of the stairs, finding his weapon and then reloading it as he climbed. He burst through the door at the top landing and killed the man at the window with a sudden spray of bullets. Two others—short frightened men—raised their hands and backed against the wall. Hallman shot them both.

He could feel the warmth of blood on his lower lip now, and he realized the man on the stairs had landed some damaging punches. But there was no pain. The exhilaration of the moment had blotted it out. He glanced out the window, but the smoke was too thick to see anything.

Leaning against the wall he tried to remember how many he'd killed. The guard, and at least two of the three in the patrol car, and the man in the passage. And the woman. The two guards out the window. And the two on the stairs. And three in this room. That made twelve, in just under five minutes. Fast work. Good work.

He took out his knife again and made sure they were dead. He was on his last clip of bullets, so he couldn't waste any more. Then he heard someone coming up the stairs, calling his name. It was Renger, carrying two suitcases. Hallman licked the blood from his lip, savoring it, and went to meet him.

"You did a damn good job," Renger told him. "You're a regular one-man army!"

"I said I was good with a gun. How many men did we lose?"

"Crowthy and Yates. The others are all right. Let's plant these explosives and get the hell out of here!"

They did their job, working fast, and then left the building with the others.

"Damn!" Renger said as they started across the muddy road toward the shelter of the woods. "I'm going to see that you get a medal for this, Hallman!"

"Thank you, Major."

"When they hear back home how you led an attack on the enemy's forward command post and helped destroy it, almost singlehanded, they'll make you a hero. How many did you kill?"

"Twelve."

"Damn good shooting!"

They passed the enemy patrol car, parked at a crazy angle on the road, and Hallman saw that the driver was still alive, gasping for breath behind the shattered windshield. He raised his carbine with one hand and killed the man with a single shot.

"That makes thirteen," he said, and walked on.

THE JURY BOX

by JOHN DICKSON CARR

With the view from my window anything but wintry, in the at of a Southern September it's not easy to round up commended titles for the summary in our near-Christmas issue. It I will try.

The year, predictably, has been much as usual: mingled gripes and hosannahs, with the praiseworthy in general outweighing the bad. In passing we have touched on many grave subjects, from the origin of "son of a bitch" to the history of the Black Maria Club, at projected, ill-fated society for studying real-life crimes which ever quite quickened into breath. But these matters have been lightly in passing, as background for the parade of fiction whose humor is now fading away.

Since I mentioned the Black Maria Club, I might add that '71 has been rich in books featuring criminals from real life. Most earnestly you are recommended to Jack McPhaul's Johnny Torrio, first of the Gang Lords, Paul Sann's Kill the Dutchman! and John Dobler's Capone.

Each is the biography of some once-important underworld Mr. Big, from the modest eminence of Arthur Flegenheimer ("Dutch" Schultz) to the dizzy pinnacle of Big Alphonse Capone, unmatched Grand Goblin of them all. These two met an unpleasant end: Schultz before gang bullets and Capone of creeping disease. Only Torrio, to point no moral or adorn no tale, died in the odor of sanctity after a peaceful old age.

And, while we deal with factual crimes, read Victorian Studies Scarlet, by Richard D. Altick. No gangsters, it's true, but picturesque, bloodthirsty wrong 'uns from the reign of the Good Queen cut capers as well as throats through a vivid grand guignol much power and charm. Yet you are most interested, perhaps, in fiction; let's turn to fiction now.

Classic detection? An abundance of it. Only once was I so sperate, with neither first-class new book nor first-class old one available in paperback, that I felt compelled to cite a classic still published at full price. Chesterton's The Father Brown Omnibus. For the rest, choice titles new and old were all over the place.

© 1971 by John Dickson Carr.

The editor-in-chief, ever-reliable Ellery Queen, weighed in with A Fine and Private Place, domestically murderous from the first marriage proposal to the shock of the last confrontation. (By the way, he also edited three anthologies.) Emma Lathen, also reliable, provided a brace of adventures, Pick Up Sticks and Ashes and Ashes, for John Putnam Thatcher of the Sloan Guaranty Trust. From established writers, hardcover and paperback too, depend on Dick Francis's Rat Race, Sara Woods's Let's Choose Execution, Hugh Pentecost's The Deadly Joke, Hillary Waugh's 33 Manhattan East, Edmund Crispin's Frequent Hearses, Phil Macdonald's Murder Gone Mad. Among newcomers, and comparative newcomers, salute Harry Carmichael (Remote Control), Ruth Rendell (A Guilty Thing Surprised), Catherine Aird (A Late Phoenix), John and Emory Bonett (The Sound of Murder).

Espionage? Beginning as far back as John Buchan's classic of World War I, The 39 Steps, we soon roar up to date with Ten Poisoners by Donald Hamilton, Assignment—Tokyo by Edward Aarons, The Twisted Wire by Richard Falkirk, Place of Mists by Robert McLeod. Ranging over all the earth for its betrayals, here cloak-and-dagger slipperiness of the true stab or vintage; don't miss any title.

This year I have even ventured to review criticism, with deserved praise for The Mystery Writer's Art by Francis M. Nevins and A Catalogue of Crime by Jacques Barzun and Wendell Hert Taylor. But such remarks stray from the point, to which we must return.

Rounding out our three categories of sensationalism with mystery-adventure, then, let me give you four mystery-adventure as strong as the detective stories or the espionage. From Victor Canning's The Great Affair and Jack Higgins's Night Adventure to Sinos to Robert L. Fish's The Green Hell Treasure and Wh. Masterson's The Gravy Train they are loaded with high explosives. The two last-named, presenting every clue, might well be called detection; and, though a critic dare pronounce nothing best, I enjoyed The Gravy Train more than any novel I have read this year.

Is it a good omen for the future? Deo volente, let's hope so!

a NEW Ponsonby story by

ALAN K. YOUNG

Professor Ponsonby, unraveler of secret messages, is challenged by a classic cipher out of the past. Admittedly, the cipher is a complex one, but we hasten to tell you it is not at all necessary for you to decipher the block of symbols. (Of course, if you want to, go ahead — and good luck!) But if you don't even try, your enjoyment of the story will in no way be diluted or diminished... Ponsonby, Professor of English emeritus at Briarwood College, becomes a more appealing character with each new story. He himself describes this adventure perfectly: "Fascinating. Most intriguing."

PONSONBY AND THE CLASSIC CIPHER

by ALAN K. YOUNG

Professor Ponsonby smiled at his old friend across the study hearth. "Well, Rene," he asked, "is it time?"

Rene LeBreau withdrew, startled, from whatever distant fantasy he had been pursuing in the depths of his brandy glass. He was a small man, with small nervous hands and a lined red face that was dwarfed by his unruly halo of white hair. At 68 he was ten years younger than his host, Briarwood College's Professor of English emeritus, but he could have passed for the same age.

"Time, Amos?" he asked. "Time for what?"

"Time to tell me what has kept you so distracted this evening. When I broached the subject earlier, you suggested it wait till after dinner. How was it Browning's Bishop Brougham put it? 'I promised, if you'd watch a dinner out, we'd see truth dawn together—truth that peeps over the glasses' edge when dinner's done.'" Ponsonby raised his own snifter. "More brandy?"

© 1971 by Alan K. Young.

"No, thank you." LeBreau's accent was primarily Oxonian with only the barest hint of his native French. "And I had forgotten, Amos. But I've been sitting here asking myself if it is time—if it would ever be time, in fact. What started my woolgathering was your telling me before dinner how you helped your local police solve one or two little puzzles recently. That set me to thinking about an unsolved puzzle of my own which I've carried about with me now for twenty-six years. Actually, it's a letter—in cipher—from a friend. I don't believe I even had it out of my wallet in a decade, yet scarcely a day goes by that I don't give it at least a passing thought."

"And in twenty-six years you've never succeeded in deciphering it?" Ponsonby chuckled. "I'm sure I'd have given up long ago and simply asked my friend what he meant by it."

"I last met this man on the street in Gramonte just two days before he sent it. That was June 2, 1944. I never saw him again."

"Ah," said Ponsonby. "Lost in the war?"

"Yes—lost in the war."

"And in all these years you've never asked an expert to decipher it for you? Do you suspect it of being too personal?"

"No—at least, I don't think so. And I doubt if it's really that difficult, if I could just put my mind to it long enough. But the night I first received it I had only a few hours to work on it before the Gestapo came for me. Then after the war, when I got home from the concentration camp and got it out from where I'd hidden it, I found I simply couldn't concentrate on it long enough. I tried telling myself it was just because it wasn't important any more but in my heart I knew—" The little Frenchman lifted haunted eyes. "Quite frankly, Amos, I've always been afraid to discover what it says!"

Ponsonby regarded his friend sympathetically. "Would it help to tell me the whole story?"

LeBreau stared into the fire for several moments. At last he said, "Perhaps it is time, after all. Do you remember, Amos, that weekend you visited me in Normandy before the war? You spent the summer at Oxford and came over to France in early September."

"The autumn of '36—how could I forget? Your Chateau Montclair was the most beautiful estate I'd ever seen, and you Denise the most beautiful hostess."

"Ah, yes, my two great loves. And how I enjoyed showing hem off! I still do the Chateau, of course, although it's not the same since Denise died. But do you recall having met a friend of mine named Victor Mornier that weekend?"

"A short, rather dark chap with an infectious laugh?"

"Yes, that was Victor. My oldest and dearest friend, even though, God help me, I was forced to cut him dead the last dozen years we met."

"Tell me," said Ponsonby softly.

The Frenchman hefted his brandy glass as though hoping to find in its weight some suggestion of where best to begin his story. Have you ever had the kind of friendship, Amos," he asked at last, "that is-at once both a close friendship and a keen rivalry? Because that's the way it was with Victor Mornier and me, almost from the cradle. We played together as children, went camping together on holidays, attended the local academy together, where we vied for the same scholastic prizes, played on the same teams, even courted the same girls. But the honors were remarkably even, so our rivalry served as a spur to our friendship rather than a handicap.

"Then in 1921 we both went off to university in England—Victor to Cambridge and I to Oxford. Unfortunately, Victor had to drop out after a year; his father had died, and far from being the wealthy man we had all supposed, the settlement of his estate showed him to have been quite deeply in debt. But I was able to help out, and Victor managed to save part of his father's land, and by the time I was graduated and had returned to Normandy he had a flourishing business going.

"It wasn't long before our rivalry was going again, as keen as ever." LeBreau smiled, remembering. "There was scarcely any skill in which we didn't feel compelled to compete—tennis, golf, bridge, chess. But most of all we liked to challenge each other with—what shall I call them?—puzzles, riddles, conundrums of all kinds. Evening after evening we would sit over our cognac just as you and I are doing tonight, testing each other with little-known facts, or playing 'Who Said That?' with obscure quotations from French or English or American literature. Victor's knowledge of your language and literature was equal to mine—his library of English books was just as extensive.

"There was only one area where I really outshone him in those days, and I'm afraid it does me no credit. I was far more of a dilettante; I played harder, I dabbled more, I squandered my time and money, while Victor had to work hard to pay off his father's debts. In fact, he was just beginning to get his head above water that dreadful autumn of '39 when the world changed so abruptly for all of us."

Again LeBreau fell silent, staring into the fire. Finally he resumed his story. "But as terrible as the war was, Amos, the most terrible thing for us in France was the suddenness with which everything ended—officially ended, at any rate. That was the blackest day of our lives, and only one thing sustained us: we knew, as surely as we knew the sun would rise the next day, that our country would one day be free again. And we knew that until that day, if we were to salvage anything of our national honor, those of us in occupied France would have to keep right on fighting the Nazis in every way we could.

"Half a dozen of us gathered at Montclair one evening in June 1940 to organize the Resistance in our arrondissement. The plan we finally settled on was to organize two underground networks—one of which would concern itself exclusively with espionage—gathering information about German troop movements and defenses to be passed on to the Free French and the British—while the other would be responsible for sabotage—derailing trains, blowing up bridges, smuggling out escaped prisoners. And because the two networks would be independent of each other except at the very top, only a few key people would know the make-up of both groups. Thus the betrayal or infiltration of one would not necessarily jeopardize the members of the other. (So we thought then."

LeBreau paused to take a sip of his brandy. "Victor and I were chosen to head the two networks. Victor was mayor of Gramont at the time, and we knew that the Nazis preferred to work with local officials provided they showed signs of cooperating accordingly, Victor was chosen to organize a group which would appear to collaborate with the Germans and would thus be relatively free to come and go, to mingle socially, to watch and listen and find a hundred opportunities to ferret out the information the Allies would need. And it fell to me to organize the other network—the dynamiters, the saboteurs, even the assassins." LeBreau shuddered, remembering.

Without asking, Ponsonby picked up the decanter and refilled his friend's glass. The firelight glinted warmly on the dark liquid. The Frenchman continued his tale.

"Because my network was to be responsible for all the hostile activities, it was decided that I should maintain contact with London by setting up a short-wave radio station in the wine cellar at Montclair. But this presented a problem: if Victor's group was to gather the information the Allies would need and I was to provide the link with the free world, we would need some means of frequent contact between us.

"It was Denise who had—what is it your American advertising people call it?—the brainstorm. She would provide the liaison by the simple expedient of having an 'affair' with Victor. The stolid unimaginative Germans would never suspect the proud seigneur of Chateau Montclair of knowingly countenancing midnight trysts between his wife and the notorious puppet mayor of Gramonte, so if Denise were to seize every opportunity to sneak off for an hour or so with Victor, the Nazis would be amused rather than suspicious.

"So, as far as the enemy was concerned, I became a cuckold, Denise an adulteress, and Victor a collaborator. And it worked, Amos; we had one of the most successful underground operations in occupied France, until"—LeBreau stared at his host as though he still did not quite believe the import of his next words—"we were all betrayed."

Ponsonby could not bear to look into his friend's memory-haunted eyes; he swirled his brandy snifter, creating a miniature whirlpool in its depths. "Do you know by whom?" he asked.

"No. We never found out. At the time of the Gestapo raids there were just nine of us who knew enough to accomplish so sweeping a betrayal. Of the nine, three died that night, either slain trying to escape capture or executed on the spot by the Gestapo, and the rest of us were arrested and sent to concentration camps in Germany. Of those six, two are known to have died in the camps while two others vanished, swallowed up in the confusion of Germany's defeat. I alone survived to return to France after the war. I've always assumed that the traitor must have been one of the two who disappeared in Germany, but I've never been certain."

Ponsonby frowned. "You said, Rene, that three died the night of the betrayal, two died in concentration camps, two disappeared, and only you survived the war. But that adds up to only eight. What of the ninth?"

"Eh?" LeBreau appeared to drag his mind back from some lonely distance. "Oh. I should have said that of those who survive the night of the raid, all but one of us were arrested. The Nazi never bothered Denise. I've often thought that the traitor whoever he was, must have been in love with her—God know there were enough of us who were—and so kept silent about his role in the Resistance."

Ponsonby carefully set down his brandy glass. "Tell me about the night of the betrayal."

"It was June 4, 1944, just two days before D-day. We didn't know that then, of course, but we did know that an Allied landing was imminent. It was just after midnight when one of my lieutenants arrived at the chateau with word of the betrayal. My people were being arrested all over the arrondissement; it was obvious that my entire network had been smashed and that it was only a matter of time before the Gestapo would come for me.

"But I still didn't know that the betrayal had included Victor's group as well, so I sent Denise off to warn him. It wasn't the first time she'd slipped away to see him after I was supposedly asleep so I knew the Gestapo wouldn't be suspicious of her absence, and I wanted to get her away from Montclair before they arrived—was hoping her cover might still be intact. She didn't want to leave me, of course, but I was able to make her see it was the wisest course.

"It wasn't until eleven months later, when I returned from the concentration camp, that I learned what had happened to her that night: how she'd arrived in sight of Victor's house just as a carload of Gestapo agents had pulled up in front and gone storming inside; how she'd hidden in a nearby barn until after dawn and then returned to Montclair to find the chateau deserted; how she'd lived for months in an agony of doubt, expecting the Gestapo to come for her at any moment.

"And of course all that time she didn't know what had become of me, either; she assumed I'd been arrested and taken to Germany, but she couldn't be certain. And of course she knew nothing about Victor's letter."

"Tell me about the letter," said Ponsonby.

"Victor's messenger arrived at Montclair with it about half an hour after Denise had left to warn him. And those next two hours, Amos, were the longest and most agonizing of my life. I knew—I knew!—that I should go at once to the short-wave radio in the cellar and send the message on to London where it could be deciphered by experts. But instead I sat there—tired, terrified, sick with worry over what might be happening to Denise, what would soon be happening to me, cursing Victor for having chosen such a time to challenge me with one last puzzle, yet unable to let go of it.

“I was in the grip of that damned rivalry, don’t you see? Because I knew that Victor, pressed for time and under the most harrowing circumstances, had still managed to devise that cipher, and I simply refused to admit that I couldn’t solve it under equally trying conditions. I knew I was behaving like a fool—but I couldn’t stop. God help me, Amos, I was like a man possessed! It didn’t even occur to me to send it on to London and then try my hand at deciphering it. I had to try it then and there.

“Then suddenly the Gestapo were pounding on my door. I managed to hide the letter where it would be safe till after the war, but by then, of course, it was too late. Denise saw that. She saw what it was doing to me and begged me to destroy it. I realize now, of course, that she was terrified that I would discover—”

A log shifted in the fireplace with a sputter. LeBreau’s unfinished sentence slid into the momentary diversion like a snake disappearing into tall grass.

“Tell me about the letter,” Ponsonby repeated hastily. “What sort of cipher did Victor use?”

“Two ciphers—rather, one cipher and one code. There’s a solid block of symbols and the letter itself, although only Denise and I would have realized that the letter was some kind of code. At least the second and third paragraphs are, because otherwise they don’t make sense.”

“May I see the letter?” asked Ponsonby.

LeBreau hesitated only a moment. Then, removing his wallet from his inside breast pocket, he extracted a small square of paper which he unfolded and handed to Ponsonby.

The latter’s eyebrows registered his surprise. “But it’s in English! Wasn’t that unusual?”

“No. Victor and I agreed when we organized our underground networks that if written communication between us became absolutely unavoidable we’d use English. That was less to deceive the Germans than to keep some young courier—and we were using virtual children in those days, God help us!—from being tempted to read something he’d be better off not knowing.”

Ponsonby turned to the letter. It was written in longhand on a single sheet of paper, badly soiled with age and handling. "Dear Rene," it began; "The cover of both our networks has been broken and our entire organization betrayed. The Gestapo will doubtless be coming for all of us before morning. As soon as I've finished this note I plan to go into hiding until the Allies arrive. Perhaps I've been a fool to have spent a whole hour devising this message, but I'm certain you will understand why I felt impelled to do so. You will not consider it good news, but it's something I wanted you to know."

Ponsonby paused, glancing at the Frenchman over the top of the letter. "And you say that these second and third paragraphs must be a code of some sort?"

LeBreau nodded and Ponsonby resumed his reading.

"And so for now, Rene, goodbye. When this war is over and these troubled days are behind us, what do you say we round up the old gang and go on a glorious holiday to that little inn near Cremona that we enjoyed so much? How was it called? L'Insetto d'Oro, wasn't it? You may remember that Jean, Kirk, Quentin, and several others weren't with us there before, but this time perhaps they'll all come. At least we can send each one a letter and let him answer for himself! Then we can all sit on the terrace of an evening, sipping our wine and watching the barges drift lazily down the river into the sunset. Remember?

"Yes, Rene; let's do it! We'll leave the world behind and anyone who would give us away can be dealt with as the need arises by you or I (although my role will have to be a small one, as I will also be busy with other matters). There is a certain fat couple whom I think we should leave at home this time—I am sure you know the ones I mean and so will not dirty my page with their names. I have stuck behind them through thick and thin, yet I know they would betray us if they could. In their place I suggest we invite one who is known to us all, a familiar substitute, a good Christian gentleman whose son will also be of the party. Again I will not say his name lest this fall into the wrong hands, but I am confident that you will take my meaning.

"But listen to me!—running on like an old fishwife when the Gestapo may be arriving at any moment! Does it all sound a crazy dream, Rene? Perhaps it is, but a dream worth dreaming, isn't it? Think about it, please!"

It was signed, simply, "Victor," with the signature followed mediately by a solid block of letters, numbers and symbols:

:2X¶3 (*u20ixz96iziX (4 (†(‡:¶09*2†z23040iXz*u6 (xzXix0]
 (4*u6i‡2zk6¶xz13 (0930z44i6u*i0?X¶3 (*u (9i¶] (9xz4u20i4) 0.
 †] i‡i]¶Xu;i43zko20i69z*¶†-(‡:uXi (6? (9z‡kz2*¶93Xu9z3‡z4 6i9¶ (4) z‡‡6 (8z‡20i (9†uz‡Xz4 (9z‡‡i‡4¶20i636 (i*k) z93?6 u9] 8 (x 306

After several minutes of careful study Ponsonby lowered the letter to his lap. "Fascinating. Most intriguing," he said.

LeBreau had been watching him intently. "The block looks familiar to you, of course?"

"It does. To anyone with an interest in the detective story and knowledge of its landmarks, the similarity is inescapable. Even if Victor hadn't put such an obvious clue in his letter."

"Ah, so you spotted that, too? That's what I meant by the thing's not making sense; a group of us had gone to Italy on holiday before the war, but we'd stayed in a little village on the Ligurian coast near Genoa, and at the Hotel Emmanuel. In any event, we were nowhere near Cremona."

"I assume that the source to which Victor was referring would have been available among the English books in his library?"

"Undoubtedly. In a French translation, too, most likely; we French regard it as a classic of your American literature."

Ponsonby was again studying the letter. "And the other statements in these second and third paragraphs are also meaningless to you?"

LeBreau nodded. "Those names Victor mentions, for instance. We did have many mutual friends, but Jean and Kirk and Quentin couldn't place at all. And then there's all that mumbo jumbo about whom we would or would not invite. Victor pretends to pass it off as a bit of gossip, but neither Denise nor I had the slightest idea whom he was talking about."

"So that those two paragraphs are almost certainly the key to the cipher which follows." Ponsonby gazed thoughtfully at his old friend, then nodded brusquely, as though confirming a sudden decision. "Tell me, Rene," he said, "why have you been so reluctant to decipher Victor's message?"

The Frenchman gestured impatiently. "But I thought that would be obvious, Amos. Remember, Victor sent that letter just two days before D-day, which we all knew to be imminent. So what more likely than that somehow he'd discovered vital information about the German defenses that might have saved thousands of Allied lives if he could have gotten word of it to London? What else would have made him take so much time over that message when he should have been running for his life?"

"But that still wouldn't explain the necessity for a cipher Rene. If the Germans had intercepted a letter containing information about their own defenses, it would scarcely have been news to them."

"Ah, but it might have been a tremendous surprise to them to learn that the Resistance had that information, too! And if it was vital information, Victor wouldn't have stopped at just one attempt to get word out; he'd have kept on trying to get his message to London from wherever he was, so that even if the Germans had intercepted his letter to me, it would still have been essential that they not be able to read it, at least not until after the invasion."

The little Frenchman leaned forward earnestly. "Don't you see Amos, that has to be the explanation of those rambling nostalgic paragraphs? Victor must have been hoping that if the Germans intercepted his letter they'd take the paragraphs at face value, and so concentrate their efforts on the cipher block. Because he knew that if his letter reached me, I would immediately recognize those paragraphs as being the key to his cipher and pass that information to London. So whatever his message was, Victor didn't care if the Germans found it out eventually, just so long as they didn't find it out at once. Which makes it all the more likely that it has something to do with the Allied invasion."

"I suppose that does make sense," admitted Ponsonby.

"You know it does, Amos. And I know that's what Denis thought, too. She was afraid if I deciphered Victor's message I'd realize that my vanity and stupidity had very likely caused the deaths of hundreds of Allied soldiers. That I was not only a fool but a murderer as well!" LeBreau buried his face in his hands. "And how in the name of God could I live with knowledge like that?"

Ponsonby stared in sympathy at his friend's bowed head. "I'm sorry, Rene. I never should have pried—"

"No!" LeBreau sat up briskly. "I've been a coward long enough! I should have asked someone less involved than I am to decipher Victor's message for me years ago. I'm afraid I can't y my departure for the Coast tomorrow, but I'll leave the r with you and stop by again on my return next week. At h time, Amos"—terror and hope fought in the Frenchman's e—"I will expect you to give me Victor's message!"

he grandfather clock in the corner of the study was striking n the following day when Ponsonby laid down his pen and ed back in his chair. Victor Mornier's deciphered message lay he desk before him.

le had set to work on it immediately following LeBreau's urture that morning. His first step had been to select, from the ion of his library devoted to Nineteenth Century American ature, a handsome, calf-bound volume which he knew to ain the two passages he must consult in order to solve the tery. The first of these was a solid block of symbols strikingly liar to the one in Victor's letter:

††††305)) 6*;4826) 4†.) 4†) ;806*;48†8†60)) 85;] 8*:†*8†
88) 5*†;46 (;88*96*?;8) † (;485) ;5†2: *† (;4956*2 (5* — ††8*;4069285) ;) 6†8) 4††;† (††9;4808†;8:8††;48†85;4) 485† 306*8† (††9;48; (88;4 (†?34;48) 4†; 16†;188;†?;

he second, a few pages on, was the deciphered version:

A good glass in the Bishop's hostel in, the Devil's —twenty-one degrees and thirteen minutes—northeast and by h—main branch seventh limb east side—shoot from the left eye ie death's-head—a bee-line from the tree through the shot fifty out."

or ten minutes Ponsonby had diligently matched alphabet r to symbol. Then he had sat in silence for almost an hour, ning over Victor's letter. The first six sentences in the second graph had given him no trouble, nor had the entire third graph—it had been easy enough to see what Victor was getting here, especially with the help he had received from William and. But the long sentence near the close of the second graph—Victor's nostalgic reminiscence about sitting on the ice of an imaginary Italian inn at sunset—had stumped him.
tumped him until he had muttered, "Confound it, the thing's ossible!"—and slapped his desk with such vehemence that he started the globe on one corner to gently spinning. In that instant he had known the solution to Victor Mornier's fi challenge. "Because it is impossible," he had murmured, reach out to stop the spinning earth.

Now another hour had passed and Victor's message unmasked before him. Ponsonby sighed as he thought of the aw moment when he must show it to LeBreau. How right, he thoug how prophetically right, Thomas Gray had been: "Wh ignorance is bliss, 'tis folly to be wise."

"Tell me, Amos, how did you go about deciphering Victo message?" It was a week later, and Rene LeBreau once again fac Ponsonby across the study hearth. The Frenchman sat stif erect, obviously braced for the worst.

Ponsonby seized the reprieve which LeBreau's question h offered. "I began," he said, "by accepting your interpretation Victor's basic plan—that he intended to devise a secret mess; and then give you an advantage over the Germans by hid certain clues to its solution in a chatty, seemingly innocent lett But even if that were so, I reasoned, his first concern must h been the cipher itself.

"It's no mean trick to devise any kind of code or cipher on t spur of the moment, and this one presented definite problems he made it too simple and the Germans did intercept his lett they'd very likely break it in a matter of hours even without t help of his clues. Too hard, and composing a letter of clues wo become impossibly difficult in the short time he could spare.

"I pictured him sitting at his desk racking his brain for solution to his problem when suddenly it occurred to him tl there was a ready-made cipher available in his library, whi thanks to your extensive collection of American literature, v almost certainly available in your library as well. He was thinki of course, of Captain Kidd's cipher in Edgar Allan Poe's story, The Gold-Bug.

"Thus Victor adopted that famous cipher as the basis for own, and in case you failed to recognize it he gave you a hint the first of his covering-letter clues by 'recalling' an imaginary v to Cremona—a city on Italy's Po River—and an equally imagin sojourn at an inn called L'Insetto d'Oro, which, of course, is t Italian for—"

"The Gold-Bug," interrupted LeBreau. "That much I h worked out for myself."

"You may have deduced some of the rest," said Ponsonby. Now, Poe's story does not list Captain Kidd's cryptographic phabet in full, but it would have taken Victor only a few inutes to work it out. He would then have discovered, however, at since Kidd's deciphered message makes no use of the letters j, q, x, and z, there are no symbols for those letters in The old-Bug cipher.

"That, of course, was no great stumbling block, but Victor obably decided that Poe's cipher would be easier to modify, as e felt it advisable to do, if he had a complete alphabet to work ith. Accordingly, he hit on the simple expedient of having each e missing letters represent itself. That's what he means in his xt clue: the phrase 'Jean, Kirk, Quentin, and several others' fers to the missing letters—j, k, q, x, and z—and the operative ords in the next sentence are 'each one a letter' and 'answer for mself.' "

Ponsonby frowned thoughtfully as he continued his planation. "I was assuming that the idea of using the Captain dd cipher had appealed to Victor because Poe's works are not as ll known in Germany as they are in France, so that even a erman intelligence officer would be less likely to recognize the urce than you would. But it must then have occurred to him at that was by no means a certainty, and that it would be wise r him to make some basic change in Poe's alphabet so as to foil e rapid solution which must otherwise follow recognition of his urce.

"I was convinced that his next sentence contained a clue to ch a change, but I was at a loss to grasp it until I finally had nse enough to refer to my globe and realized—something I ould have recalled at once—that the Po River flows into the riatric Sea. That is to say, it flows toward the east, so that it ould have been impossible to have watched barges 'drift . . . into e sunset.' In short, Victor reversed the direction of the river to dicate to you that he had reversed the alphabet in The old-Bug."

"So that the symbols for a, b, c, and so on in Poe's cipher—?" gan Lebreau.

"Became the symbols for z, y, x, and so on in Victor's. ecisely. But even with that change, as Victor himself must have en realized, he still had a cipher that was no great challenge. onsequently, I pictured him next as thrashing about in his mind!

for some way to make it just a bit more difficult. And since he had recalled Poe's story for his basic cipher, it seemed logical that he should also recall William Legrand's method of decipherment. You'll remember that Legrand used the prevalence of the letter e and the frequency with which it is doubled in English.

"Accordingly, I assumed that the phrase, 'anyone who would give us away,' near the beginning of Victor's third paragraph referred to the letter e, and that the balance of that clause—'can I deal with . . . by you or I'—indicated something he planned to do to it. Now no man with a command of English such as you attributed to Victor Mornier was likely to use 'I' as the object of preposition. Accordingly, I suspected the error to have been deliberate, and my suspicion immediately pointed to the meaning of his clue: orally, you see, you and I are letters as well as words, and Victor was here indicating his intention of using those letters as additional symbols for e, thus giving him three possible e's at a frustrating any attempt to break his code on the basis of simple letter frequency.

"In the parenthetical phrase which follows"—Ponsonby stressed the key words as he read aloud from Victor's letter—" 'although my role will have to be a small one, as I will also be busy with other matters,' he acknowledges the fact that capital I is used elsewhere in Poe's cipher, so that it will have to be a small lower-case i which serves as one of his stand-ins for e."

Ponsonby paused to marshal his thoughts. "Now I should point out that throughout these deductions I had been ignoring the step which Poe correctly observes to be primary in solving any cipher—that of determining the language of the original message. Because it wasn't working with the cipher itself, you see, but merely with Victor's clues, and I was confident that once I had worked out his alphabet, words in one language or another would begin to emerge from his cipher. Even Victor's concern with the letter e was a confirmation, since that letter is even more prevalent in French than it is in English.

"His next clue, however, made it clear that his deciphered message must be in English, for, again following Legrand's lead, I next turned his attention to the combination th, which occurs with great frequency in English but relatively seldom in French. Victor identifies it as 'a certain fat couple . . . I have stuck behind them through thick and thin'—as of course i does."

Ponsonby stopped abruptly, startled by the awkward sound the phrase. Then he smiled wryly at his own ingrained purism and resumed his explanation. "To replace th, Victor tells us, he is going to use 'a familiar substitute,' and of course the most familiar substitute for the unknown in the realm of symbols is the capital

An illiterate man will substitute it for his signature, or an advertiser will substitute the term 'Brand X' when he wishes to refer to a rival product. And Victor then goes on to describe X as 'a good Christian gentleman' because X has stood for centuries as a symbol for the name of Christ. Finally he adds, 'whose son will also be of the party,' by way of acknowledging the fact that a small x is in use elsewhere in his cryptographic alphabet and could not be confused with the capital X which will serve as his substitute for th.

"So to sum up, Victor took the incomplete alphabet invented by Poe for his story The Gold-Bug, filled in the gaps, reversed it, added additional symbols to disguise the most obvious weak spots in any English cipher—that is, the letter e and the combination th—and arrived at the following." Leaning forward, Ponsonby handed LeBreau a sheet of paper on which he had written out these symbols:

a = z	j = q	s = 4
b = :	k = .	t = 3
c = x	l = ‡	u = I d =]	m = *	v = 8
e = ¶, u or i	n = 9	w = †
f = ?	o = 0	x = —
g = ;	p = k	y = 2
h =)	q = j	z = 5
i = (	r = 6	th = X

LeBreau studied the paper for several seconds. Then he took a deep breath, like a man about to plunge into an icy river, and asked, "And Victor's message?"

Ponsonby picked up a second sheet of paper from the table. I'm afraid it explains a great deal, Rene. We both should have realized all along that Victor would not have been so foolish as to think that any spur-of-the-moment cipher could baffle German experts for more than a few hours. But of course it wasn't the Germans he was trying to deceive."

"Please," said LeBreau, holding out his hand.

Ponsonby sighed, and handed the deciphered message to his friend. He himself knew it by heart, so often had he read it over.

"By the time you can read this I will be on my way to South America. The code is merely a precaution to assure me of the time I need in case you should elude the Gestapo. Your name will be their final payment. Then at last, Rene, I shall rival you in wealth as in all else. Your triumphant friend, Victor."

LeBreau finished, then slowly crumpled the paper in his hand. He lifted his haunted eyes to Ponsonby. "How could I have been so blind, Amos? So completely mistaken?"

"War can do strange things to a man, Rene. I'm sure the Victor Mornier who sent you that message was not the same man you had known in happier days."

"But all these years I've thought—"

"That he was dead? But even if he wasn't, Rene, even if he is still alive somewhere in South America, do you think his conscience has ever given him a moment's rest? A man who betrayed his friends, his country—"

"No, Amos"—LeBreau gestured feebly—"you don't understand. I've known all along that Victor was dead. A neighbor found him a few days after the betrayal. The Gestapo had taken him down to his cellar and made him kneel before a crude swastika scratched on the wall and then shot him in the head. I realize now they were simply ridding themselves of a French traitor who had outlived his usefulness, but in Gramonte we assumed he'd been executed for his role in the Resistance. And of course I always believed he sacrificed a chance to escape just to encipher a message that thanks to me, never even reached the Allies."

With a groan LeBreau hurled the crumpled paper into the fireplace. "Don't you see, Amos? For twenty-six years I've been haunted by the guilt that, no matter what was in Victor's message, I had betrayed him."

DEPARTMENT OF SECOND STORIES

Richard A. Selzer's first story, "A Single Minute of Fear," in the January 1971 issue of EQMM, was an exceptional debut in print. His second story is just as "filled with suspense and a growing sense of terror," and even goes beyond... It is the story of a "dark place"—the dark place in a cave about two miles from town, and the dark place in the human heart...

"She lay awake and thought about another, deeper darkness, and about how dark it can get, blacker and blacker, but never reaching perfect blackness... And of how they were all living in it..."

This story has a truly haunting quality...

THE DARK PLACE

by RICHARD A. SELZER

Ada heard the commotion all the way to her upstairs back-bedroom, where she had gone to escape the afternoon heat. It came through her drowse, subtly at first, then growing, and finally annoying her into wakefulness. A man was shouting and children were whooping and screaming. She tried to hear but the words were not clear, and she was left wondering. Finally there was an urgency in the voices and in the running feet that made her get up and stand by the front window. She could hear the words clearly now.

"Where?"

"The cave. He was sitting there just inside when they saw him, skinning a possum."

"Who was he?"

"Don't know. The kids said a wild man, thin and white, with wild staring eyes, all dressed in black rags. They hid in the bushes and watched. When they made a sound he turned around to see, then ran into the cave."

"What's going to be done?"

"Well, c'mon, everyone's headin' up there now. They've got ropes, flashlights, and guns—he may be dangerous!"

© 1971 by Richard A. Selzer.

The voices faded and Ada looked down on the street burnt dry in the sun. She was trembling, and suddenly it was hard to breathe. "Pippo," she whispered. "Oh, my God, it's Pippo, I know it. I'm certain. It's Pippo!"

She ran down the stairs out into the street. It was empty; they had already left. The whole town. The whole town was just one main street bracketing the old post road, with a few extra houses added carelessly on the periphery. The cave was about two miles from town. There were bobcats up there, and bears. And hardly anyone went up in that tangled mess, except for an occasional hunter or children exploring the woods.

She could see the line of people moving up the path above. They were following a curve on the hill that threw them into her direct vision. The women in their yellow and blue cotton dresses followed the men who marched determinedly ahead. Behind and alongside, the children fluttered like rags. From the distance it looked gay. She ran, and walked and ran until she had caught up with the stragglers.

"There it is," a man called. "All right now, everybody, stand back. Give us room."

Lloyd Bascom had taken charge. She watched him as though she hadn't seen him every day of her life, as though he were a stranger, or rather as if she had suddenly become a stranger and was now peering into the rites of an old and mysterious people. These people were wearing new faces—people she had known all her life. She remembered a game she used to play. It was a terrible game in which she would imagine how each person would look if he were insane. It was remarkable, but she felt that she could tell just what they'd do, how they'd look. Some women would wear timid housedresses, and make their lips go, and once in a while dart a brilliant smile at the far edge of vision. Others, stung with animation, would hop and jump ceaselessly, gesticulating with their skinny arms and legs. And there were those men, private as gorillas, who peered from under great frontal bulges, enraged, dull. She hadn't thought of the game for years, but today it came back to her, and as she looked about at the faces she could see the craziness like an abscess that had pressed its way to just under the skin.

She joined the crowd gathered in an arc in front of the entrance. The children were already climbing trees to get a better view. There were laugh-er and chattering among the women. Ada stared at the great blank mouth fringed with whiskery shrubs. She shivered in the rank, cold, sour belch which emanated from it. She watched the men knotting and oiling their ropes, slinging them easily over their shoulders. Flashlights were tested the final time and a group of eight men separated itself from the body and flowed unsteadily, awkwardly, into the cave. Light quivered on the lips of the hole for a few moments, and then it was black again. A silence fell on those outside. There were faint callings and routings from the cave as the expedition deepened.

Ada stood for a time staring into the blackness. Then in a quick movement she was at the edge of the cave. Without breath or backward glance she slipped silently into its shadow, making as much noise as a power when it closes for the night. It was a relief to be aside, out of sight. She did not have to hold herself so tightly. She could breathe! And the invisibility that the cave bestowed seemed to expand and free her. If it is Pippo, she thought—yes, it must be.

Far ahead she could see the dimming, swaying lights of the hunters. They were moving slowly.

"Stay close, Bud."

"Where are you, Lloyd?"

"Over here. Look out now, he may be anywhere and we don't know what he's got to throw at us. If there's any question about it, shoot first and find out later."

They had gone about two hundred yards. It seemed like miles to Ada, who followed behind, edging sideways through the darkness and hugging the cold slimy walls. Pippo. My little brother Pippo, she thought. Why? When you didn't come back I went out looking. Didn't you hear me? You said you were going for a walk, and then you never came back. The townspeople searched and searched for you, but after a while they gave up.

"He must have fallen and hurt himself," they had said. "Must've been took by a bear or a cat." Oh, how I cried!

The men were moving more slowly. Their voices had been harsh, overlapping, reverberating, but now they were strangely hushed, full of hisses and coughs. There was fear in the cave, and with it, hate. The courage and stamp was now replaced by a clustering, a need to huddle, to back into a safe center where there was no heroism, only a hope that the wild man's blow, when struck, would miss, hit the next man.

It was cool, and Ada wondered at the sweat that ran from her hair onto her neck and temples. It had a thick slimy feel. There were currents of air on her face, and sound, a clicking, sharp and rapid. With a start she realized its source as a bird flew at her head and swerved off at the last moment. But in the faint light of the nervous men ahead, she saw the red eyes and three-foot wing-spread. Lighter winds touched her, and once she suppressed a scream of surprise at the leathery whisk of a bat across her face. Now and then she could see the undulating carpet of wings and eyes that covered the ceiling. A steady rain of droppings fell to the floor, and the stench of ammonia was biting. The slimy wall of the cave sucked at her nape as she pressed against it.

She had caught up with the men and the walking was a bit easier now, despite the sticky mud of the floor. At least she could see to walk. She marveled at her lack of fear. In its place she felt a kind of elation, as though she were on the brink of a great discovery. They had gone about six hundred yards, and abruptly the cave narrowed to a cone. They could go no farther. They were single file and those behind had bumped into the ones in front.

"Watch out! Looks a though it ends here. Unless there's a side path we've missed somewhere."

"No chance. I've covered it all with my light," said Lloyd Bascom.

"Where do we go now?"

"Back, I guess. Whatever it is knows this cave better than we do and he's hidin' somewhere. I think we'd better get out now."

There was a general shuffling, a mixture of disappointment and relief.

"Wait!" The call was sharp authoritative.

"What is it?"

"Here's an opening!"

The light revealed a hole, no more than a foot and a half in diameter, at the level of the floor. Lloyd was kneeling at the opening, peering along the beam of his light.

"It's a few feet long. And narrow. There's empty space beyond—another chamber looks like. Hey!" he shouted into it. "Come out of there. Come out or we'll block it up."

"Yeah, block it up, Lloyd."

"No, let's try to get a look at him first."

They were torn between the need to escape the wild man and his dark place, and the lust deep and powerful as blood, to see him, prod him, encircle him.

"Let's smoke him out. Here's the tear gas."

"Yeah."

The arm was raised and lunged back for an underhanded ss.

"Stop!" Her voice shocked r. It commanded. There was beggary in it. They wheeled to see her. Ada felt thinner and taller than she was. She let them assault her with their slights, let the beams travel across her body, covering each part and then lingering on her face, blinding her. She stared straight ahead.

"What the hell? Who is it?"

"Ada! Whatcha doin' here?"

"I can get through there," she said quietly. "Give me a slight and I'll crawl through."

"No, you won't. Keep out of this, Ada. Now you're here, we won't send you back, but you damn well better stay out of the way."

She headed straight into the narrowest beam of light. It moved to a burning spot on her breast, and she took it from the lax hand that held it.

"Let her do it, Lloyd. If she can get in, she can always get out."

Ada was already on her knees in front of the hole, then she stood on her face, her thin arms etched in front, one hand groping in the muddy floor. The passage was tight. For the first foot of the way there was hope, then the passage narrowed. The back of her head hit against the rock, and pebbly mud slipped through her lips and between her teeth. Her shoulders wedged, scraped, then slid an inch, the tunnel biting into her flesh with each push. Abruptly strength left her and she lay exhausted. Her heaving chest strained against the floor. It was like a vise that clamped ever tighter, or in which she had somehow swollen.

Behind, the voices of the men whispered. Their feet shuffled as they waited.

"You makin' it, Ada?"

She forced down the panic. Expelling all the air from her lungs she sank the fingers of one hand into the floor, pushing with her feet, pulling with her fingers. She burst through the narrows and felt her shoulders spilling out into space. With a final kick she was inside. It was cool and damp. And still. No currents of air brushed her skin.

Ada rose and turned the flashlight in a tentative circle about her. The floor was covered with dry silt, from which no dust rose as she walked. The humidity must have been absolute, for in a few moments she was dripping with sweat and condensation. The walls were a soft sand-color, and here and there a trickle of water ran down, leaving a glistening trail behind. Scurrying out of range of the light were spectral little beasts—white beetles and crayfish and pale pink salamanders. She wondered how they lived here, what they ate. A recess in the wall coned into a path and she followed it, stooping where the ceiling swooped low above her, stepping around small shallow pools in which little insects plopped.

"Pippo!" she called softly. "Pippo, it's me, Ada. Don't be afraid. Pippo, please, if you're here let me know. Pippo!"

Her voice became hollow, with metallic echoes fading at the end. "Pippo!" she called, and the name came back to her with ever-increasing frequency, gaining in urgency and mania, then dying off. She came to another chamber, larger than the first, and stopped at the entrance, scanning the walls. A salamander, caught in the glare, stood poised on the wall. She stepped toward it, then felt the shock of another person's presence.

Her heart triggered like a machine gun, shaking her body with its volley. She aimed the light at the wall opposite her, higher and higher, in slow even sweeps. Suddenly it jumped in her hand like a fish. Something large and black hung on the wall high up. She forced light back with both hands saw him, hanging from a r twenty feet up. Emerging f a tatter of black rags were sticklike appendages, whit milk. The sinews stood out rods with the effort of clin to the wall. A tangle of b hair framed a face whose w skeleton seemed ready to b through the skin.

"Pippo," she breathed. Ada. I've found you. C down, don't be afraid. I'm going to hurt you. Oh, Pi I've missed you. Please, pl come down."

She had come closer to and could see the droplet moisture caught in the clou his hair. They glistened winked as he turned his nec stare down behind him. little muscles around his i twitched, snoutlike, and his white eyes reached out for like suckers. Not the sma light of recognition war them. They were animal that spoke directly, with subtlety, of fright and flight

She was strangely c There was excitement enc to have laid her panting on ground, but her breaths c slowly, evenly. There was wild thudding in her ches was as if she stood in the ey a hurricane, unbuffeted for moment, able to see with s larity that her vision burned back up into her brain.

She took a few small steps toward him. The dead-white eyes, like picked lilies, never left her. She was close beneath him now and raised her hand toward him with deliberate slowness, until her arm was fully extended, fingers straining.

"Pippo! Reach down. Touch me." If only he would touch me, she thought. It was with a small shock that she recognized parts of herself in that face. There had been a strong resemblance, everyone said—like two peas in a pod" or cut from the same cloth." It was like looking into a crazy mirror where lines undulate with each breath. There was the same cleft chin, the same thin oval face, and those unfortunate ears. His nose was thinner, tighter than before, and his mouth hung slightly open. For a single lacerating moment she saw herself up there clinging to the cave wall. It was as though his face had given in grudgingly to the changes of the cave, but still held to its family structure and form.

Even on tiptoe she could not reach him and he made no move toward her. He clung to whatever tiny crevices and outtings were there. From far behind she heard the voices of the men.

"Ada!" they called. "Come back! Now-ow-ow..."

Pippo heard them too and his eyes never left her.

She turned then, and cupping her hands to her mouth, called back, "I'm coming... There's no one here."

She turned back to him, and in a voice she had never used before, said softly, "Goodbye."

She backed off a few steps, turned the light to the entrance, and walked to the narrow little tunnel.

"I'm coming," she said.

"It's about time. Damn you, Ada, what took so long? We had half a mind to leave you here to rot."

The squeeze through was not half as hard as before, as though the cave itself was not anxious to keep her. She stood up on the other side and faced the converging beams of light.

"It's empty."

"The kids must have made it up. Let's go, Lloyd. This place is bad. Those kids will get the beating of their lives when we get back."

Ada submitted passively to their orders and took her place in line. She moved like a sleepwalker, but still she was calm and felt a queer emotion, hard to identify. She was surprised when she finally linked it to a kind of happiness. She caught herself smiling, and as the light at the entrance widened she closed her eyes to hold it out.

The next morning she went to the hardware store and bought a jackknife and a canteen. Mr. Cantrell looked at her for a long questioning moment, then wrapped her purchases and handed her the package in silence. Yesterday he would have asked, "What you want with a knife, Ada? Fixin' to go hunting?" and he would have smiled at any response she gave; but today it was different. Did he suspect her?

Then there was the grocer. She bought cheese and ham and cans of fruit, things she rarely bought, and enough to feed a family. Adam Patterson was a simple man, but that day he asked her, "You layin' in for the winter, Ada, or are you goin' to set up shop in your parlor for competition." Did he suspect, too?

She had mumbled and smiled, and carried home the big brown bag full of food.

Every morning she went to the cave and sat down in the shade of the rock for a few minutes of rest. It was a steep climb and even in the morning the heat and gnats were tiring.

Not that she minded, not a bit. In fact, she had developed certain taste for the exertion like a long-distance runner who savors the straining of his body. Resting in the shade, she felt certain peacefulness. She could see the village down below straddling the road. On the farms, clumsy cows, released from the barns, were stumbling into each other to get to pasture.

Up here on the mountain it was cool and crackling dry, and the trees were big enough to hold onto a bit of the night even in the midst of day. Up here there were no zinnias or roses or asters, no garden stuffed with hollyhocks—more hollyhocks than people in the town! Only a trillium surprised now and then, or a jack-in-the-pulpit just where it belonged.

After a few minutes Ada would rise, take a deep breath as though gulping air before going underwater, then step into the darkness of the cave. She advanced until she needed to pause and wait for her eyes to accommodate to the darkness, and then walked on. At about twenty yards from the mouth she knelt and put a brown paper bag on the ground. With a smile of satisfaction she noted that yesterday's bag was empty, folded neatly and tucked under a corner of the rock. She slipped it out and withdrew, blinking into the daylight.

When she got back to town there was still no one stirring in the streets. The clock on the kitchen wall said 6:30. The whole trip had taken one hour.

On her thirty-first trip to the cave the bag which she had left the day before had not been opened. It was exactly as she had left it. She placed the full new bag alongside it and after pausing as if trying to come to a decision, she abruptly left the cave and went home.

Ada sat for a long time in the chair by the bedroom window. Through dusk she sat, the world filling up with particles of darkness until, with the addition of one more speck, night was realized. At that she rose and walked to the kitchen. She made a tunafish sandwich, wiping the extra mayonnaise carefully from the edges before she wrapped it in waxed paper. Then she selected an apple from a bowl on the table, washed it and polished it on her apron. Together with a napkin full of cookies, she packed the brown paper bag. She had always prepared the food the night before.

That night she did not sleep. She lay awake and thought about another, deeper darkness, and about how dark it can get, blacker and blacker, but never reaching perfect blackness. Like infinity, because there would always be a touch of gray in it. And of how they were all living in it, only in different degrees of the blackness, even at noon, and if you thought of it that way it seemed pure and serene.

When she got to the cave she did not stop to rest from the climb as she usually did, but strode immediately in, taking the darkness on her arms like the sleeves of a robe, which she then pulled close around her. At twenty yards she stopped and saw the two bags, untouched, on the floor. She placed the third one next to the others, took the flashlight from her pocket, and flicking it on, felt her way into the corridor of the cavern.

The slick on the walls sparkled icily in the beam of light. It was as though she had come this way many times, rather than just once before. She knew the juttings and ledges, knew precisely where the soft sound of wings, like that of blankets flapping in the wind, would startle her, precisely when she would have to stop to let her nose adjust to the ammonia smell of the bat droppings. The small black eye of the inner opening gazed gravely up at her, and she knelt, then lay on the slimy floor, her arms outstretched before her.

One hand clutching the light, Ada raked at the ground with the other, pulling herself forward. At first she was able to use her hips and knees and quickly came to the narrow part. There she rested, lying limply for a minute in the clutch of stone. Then, bending her ankles as far as she could, she pushed with her toes, pulling all the while with her free hand.

It was slow, and minutes went by seemingly without a jot of progress. She could feel the pain of scrapes on her shoulders and head, and the hard pressure on her chest. She was afraid for only one moment when she felt nausea and thought she might throw up. I mustn't, she thought, and slowed her pace, alternating her thrusts with deep exhalations. There was a sudden little give and she heard herself gasp and moan as the rock cut into her skin.

Her head was free, another gasp. A push, a clawing at nothing, then a tiny twist, a wrench so small as to be imperceptible, yet enough. A shoulder was through, then the other. For a long moment she lay there, then mentally gathering her chest, trunk, abdomen, and legs behind her, like the segments of a worm, she flung her body through to freedom. It did not take long to reach the inner vault. She knew the way, each rock and pool.

At the entrance she turned to face the wall where she had first seen him. Her light roved slowly back and forth across the base of the cave, from ceiling to floor. At the bottom, jutting into the circle of light, she saw his foot, white, thin, the delicate toes. Her light moved to include the rest in its pale membrane.

He lay where he had fallen, his moth-white face bent backward, too far back, and twisted on the broken neck. Dark black solid blood surrounded him, pasting his hair to the ground, where white blind beetles and pale salamanders darted and dipped.

Ada took it all in. She had seen it in her mind all day, and felt no surprise or shock. With stately steps she walked to the wall of the cave and ran her hand across it, gathering the slimy mud. She walked to the spot where he lay and descended to one knee. Deliberately she smeared the mud on his face, while the flashlight flickered and danced like a candle.

a NEW Captain Leopold story by

EDWARD D. HOCH

As head of the Division of Violent Crimes, Captain Leopold often tackled unusual cases. This new one seemed routine enough—until they examined the burglar's loot. And then—but as Lieutenant Fletcher liked to say: "Only doing our job, Captain"....

CAPTAIN LEOPOLD DOES HIS JOB

by EDWARD D. HOCH

Snuffy Rogers was in the apartment, working fast, when he saw the flashing red light of the patrol car. He stood by the window for a moment, then picked up the laundry bag full of loot that he'd collected during the past half hour. There was no time to look for any more now.

He dropped from the ground-floor window to the soft earth and hoisted the laundry bag to his shoulder. It had been a profitable night's work, with some unexpected treasures. Perhaps he could even take a month off. Burglary was a dangerous profession—one to be savored rather than devoured—and he knew when to go slow.

He was moving through the blackness of the yard and heading for his car on the next street when he saw the patrolman coming up between the houses. Someone had seen him, or heard him, and called the police. The cop was one of those clever ones—park on the next street and come through the back yards. He should have been a burglar like Snuffy.

"Hold it! I see you!" the patrolman yelled, flashing his light, and Snuffy broke into a run. In his younger days he could have outrun any cop on the force, but things were different now. He was older, had a paunch, and the sack on his shoulder must have weighed close to fifty pounds.

© 1971 by Edward D. Hoch.

"Halt or I'll shoot!" the patrolman bellowed, but Snuffy kept on running. He turned the corner of a house, out of range of the cop's gun, and headed toward the street. His car was a block away, but if he made it across the street he thought he'd be safe.

It was nearly midnight and there was no traffic, so he didn't pause at the curb. He was halfway across when the blue sports car rounded the corner, coming fast, and hit him. He saw only the sudden glare of lights and heard a blast from the horn, and then there was a thudding pain, and then there was nothing . . .

The case came to Captain Leopold's attention the following morning, over coffee with Lieutenant Fletcher. It was a bright day in late October, one of those that seemed to hint beguilingly at a return of summer, and Leopold felt good. His duties as head of the department's Violent Crimes Division had unaccountably dropped off in recent weeks. It was almost enough to make one believe that peace and brotherly love had returned to city life.

"We had an interesting one last night, Captain," Fletcher said. "Though I guess it's all cleared up now."

"Family trouble?" Leopold asked, sipping his coffee.

The lieutenant shook his head. "Guy killed by an auto."

"Hit-and-run?" Leopold rarely worried about vehicular homicides. With their wealth of physical evidence they were among the easiest cases to solve.

"No, a girl named Sue Dwyer was driving the car, and she stopped right away. We're getting a statement from her across the hall right now. But the guy she hit was Snuffy Rogers."

"The burglar?"

"None other. And he still had his latest loot in a sack over his shoulder. He'd just worked over an apartment house on Maplewood Crescent, and Hank Duffy was chasing him through the back yards. Snuffy ran into the street and got himself killed."

Leopold poured some more coffee, thankful for the office percolator the boys had given him when he took over in Violent Crimes. The antiquated coffee machine down the hall had a perverse habit of breaking down during an all-night interrogation or the pre-election vice raids, just when it was needed most. "He had quite a record," Leopold commented, remembering Snuffy's familiar little squirrel-face in the morning lineups.

"Fifteen arrests in the last three years alone! Fifty-two years old and he spent half his life behind bars! But there's an interesting angle to this one, Captain. He was carrying this ark-blue laundry bag full of loot from the apartments—a clock-radio, a portable tape recorder, a .22-caliber target pistol, a batch of costume jewelry, and a piggy bank full of half dollars. But the next item is the interesting one, Captain. Snuffy had a plastic-wrapped quantity of cocaine in his sack."

"Cocaine?"

Fletcher nodded. "About a pound. The lab boys are testing to see how pure it is. Could be worth as much as $100,000."

"A good haul for Snuffy. Where'd he get it?"

"That's the problem, Captain. Three of the four apartments in the house were burglarized, but all four tenants deny the cocaine is theirs."

"I'd hardly expect them to admit it. Any chance Snuffy had the stuff in his sack before the robbery?"

"Not likely. Why carry a pound of cocaine with you on a burglary? It wouldn't make sense."

"Who are the four tenants? Anybody we know?"

Fletcher read from the report in his hand. "Miss Paula Shipley, schoolteacher; Robert Nelson, factory worker; Mr. and Mrs. Ambrose, a retired couple whose apartment wasn't robbed; and the owner of the building, Aaron Stone."

Leopold perked up. "Aaron Stone? On Maplewood Crescent? Didn't his wife commit suicide last summer?"

He went to the file drawer that held the cases he'd closed during the year. Most, happily, had been closed by arrest and conviction. Linda Stone's case had been closed by the Medical Examiner's report.

"Here it is—last July twenty-second. She locked herself in the garage and left the car motor running. Stone found her and called an ambulance, but it was too late. She was only thirty-one, in good health, and she left no note. Her husband could offer no reason for suicide—he seemed really shocked by it. He's in his early forties, fairly well off, and owns a little movie theater in addition to the apartment house. I was thinking of looking for another woman, but the M.E. called it suicide, so we dropped it."

"Think she killed herself because her husband was on cocaine?"

"A unique motive, but an unlikely one. Let's see this girl whose car hit Snuffy."

Fletcher led him across the hall, where Patrolman Hank Duffy and a plainclothes detective were talking to a blue-eyed girl in her early twenties. Sue Dwyer wore a flashy yellow pants suit that matched her hair, and talked in a swift sure manner that Leopold liked.

"—and then, like I said, I left my boy friend's apartment and started home. The streets were pretty empty and I suppose I was driving a little faster than usual. Anyway, all of a sudden this—man darted out from between two houses and ran into the street. The officer there was chasing him. I slammed on my brakes and hit the horn, but it was too late. The officer told me he was a suspected burglar. He went and called the ambulance on his car radio, but the man was already dead."

Leopold stood on the sidelines, saying nothing, while Officer Duffy and the detective in charge ran through the routine questions. No, she hadn't been drinking. No, Snuffy Rogers hadn't said anything before he died. She'd just stood there, horrified by the dead man at her feet.

Leopold stepped into the hall with Fletcher. "Any chance she was waiting to pick Snuffy up and ran him down instead?"

Fletcher snorted. "You been reading those mystery novels again, Captain. Snuffy was fifty-two years old—an ugly little guy with half his teeth missing. This gal was twenty-three, and real classy. There's no connection between them. Besides, Snuffy's getaway car was in the next block."

"All right," Leopold sighed. "Let's talk to Aaron Stone."

But instead they found Robert Nelson, a tall bearded youth who worked the midnight shift at Pako Plastics, a nearby manufacturer of novelty items. He seemed at first glance to be the most likely owner of a pound of cocaine, but Leopold had learned long ago not to jump to conclusions about hairy young people.

"Stone?" the bearded youth answered their inquiry. "He's down at his theater. The Franklin Cinema, on Franklin Avenue. He's there most afternoons and every night since his wife died."

"Then he wasn't in the house during the burglary?"

"Heck no! He was at the theater and Miss Shipley was out, and I'd just left for work. That guy knew when to pick his places."

"What was stolen from your apartment?"

"A tape recorder and a get pistol that I use netimes."

"That's all?"

"That's all," the bearded uth answered with a grin. hey asked me about the caine, but I never use the ff."

"How did he get into your artment?"

Fletcher interrupted to plain. "He entered Stone's artment first, Captain, rough a ground-floor droom window. He must ve known Stone was at the eater. Cut the screen and osted himself through—you a see his scuff marks on the l. Then, apparently, he found one's set of keys to the other ee apartments. He entered lson's and Miss Shipley's rough the front doors. Mr. d Mrs. Ambrose were at me, though, so he passed em by."

"He must have been in my ice last," Nelson volunteered. ou can see his footprints here he dropped out the ndow when he saw the police ming."

Leopold grunted and glanced t the indicated window. lson's apartment was on the ound floor, next to Stone's; ss Shipley and the Ambrose uple lived on the second or. "Thanks for your help,"

he told Nelson. "We may be back."

They went up the front stairs to the Ambrose apartment, and Fletcher rang the bell. Presently a wrinkled, elderly face appeared at the door opening. "We don't want none," the woman said. "Go away."

"Police, Mrs. Ambrose. We're checking the burglary."

"He didn't get in here. I thought I heard something at the door, and I saw him going down the steps. That's when I called the police." The door began to close.

"Is Mr. Ambrose in?"

"My husband is confined to bed. He never sees anyone."

The door shut with finality, and Fletcher sighed. "What now, Captain?"

"They hardly seem the cocaine type, so they're probably telling the truth. Snuffy would be too smart to enter an occupied apartment, anyway." He glanced at the opposite door. "Miss Shipley?"

Fletcher nodded and rang the bell. Paula Shipley appeared after a moment, a handsome woman in her late thirties who invited them in without hesitation. "I just got home from school a few minutes ago," she explained. "I teach fifth grade. Let me put on some tea. Or coffee?"

"Nothing for us," Leopold insisted. "About the robbery—"

The woman moved to the tea pot, her gestures almost masculine. "I was playing bridge with some friends, and it was later than usual when I returned home. The police were already here."

"Just what did he take, Miss Shipley?"

"Some costume jewelry I had in the bedroom. And a clock-radio, too." She tugged nervously at the collar of her dress, as if it were too tight.

Leopold cleared his throat. "You've heard about the narcotics he stole from one of the apartments, Miss Shipley? Any idea which apartment?"

She thought for a moment, then shook her head. "No, this is a quiet place to live. No trouble, no wild parties."

"There was trouble last summer," Leopold reminded her. "Mr. Stone's wife killed herself."

"Yes." She looked away quickly. "A real tragedy. It ruined the poor man. He spends all his time at that theater now."

"Did you have any reason to think it wasn't suicide?" Leopold asked.

"No," she answered slowly. "I don't know what you mean."

"I guess I don't know, either. Thanks for your help anyway."

She saw them to the door. "Do you think that bearded fellow downstairs had the drugs?"

"We don't know yet. We're looking into it."

They went downstairs and found Robert Nelson standing by his front door. "She tell you the cocaine was mine?" he asked.

"No, not really."

"I could tell you some things about her."

"What sort of things?"

"She has some strange parties up there. And not with guys."

"I see," Leopold said.

"And the other two—Mr. and Mrs. Ambrose! They're plain wacky! You never even see him. Maybe he doesn't exist."

"That's a possibility," Leopold admitted with a smile.

They got in the car and headed for Aaron Stone's movie house. "Which one do you think had the cocaine?" Fletcher asked.

"I really don't know. The people are victims of Fletcher—victims of Snuff Rogers. And here we are trying to make villains out of them."

"Only doing our job, Captain."

"Sure. Got any ideas?"

"Seems to me Snuffy would have quit after he found the cocaine. That would make it the last apartment he searched."

"Nelson's place."

"It adds up, Captain."

"Snuffy would have quit if he knew what he had."

"They didn't call him Snuffy for nothing. He knew."

"They called him Snuffy because he took snuff in his mouth, not because he sniffed cocaine. I knew him from way back, Fletcher. A street character, a jailbird, a loser all his life. Still, I have to agree. He probably knew cocaine when he saw it."

They pulled up in front of the Franklin Cinema, a neighborhood theater that had seen better days. A chain had unloaded it a few years back because there was no convenient parking area, and Leopold imagined that Aaron Stone had probably purchased it cheap. Judging by the third-rate Italian sex comedy advertised on the marquee, he still wasn't drawing crowds.

The theater was not yet open for the evening's business, but they found an unlocked door and went in. Aaron Stone, a husky middle-aged man with gray sideburns, was polishing the glass on the candy counter. He looked up as they entered, and to Leopold he seemed ten years older than last July, at the time of his wife's suicide. He studied them, but did not seem to recognize Leopold.

"We're investigating the burglary at your apartment house," Leopold explained after they'd introduced themselves.

Stone nodded quickly, nervously. "I just came from headquarters. I wanted to see the loot and help identify it."

"We'll return it soon. All except the cocaine."

"I can't believe that came from any of my tenants."

"He stole it from somewhere. What did he take from you?"

"Only a piggy bank full of half dollars. About twenty dollars, I think. And the keys to the other apartments, of course."

Leopold nodded. Then, "I'm sorry to bring this up, but I investigated the death of your wife last summer. As I remember, you were puzzled by the reason for her suicide."

Stone gave a little nod. "Yes, Leopold—I remember you now. But what does Linda's death have to do with—?"

"Any chance she was on narcotics, that the cocaine was hidden by her in your apartment?"

"Impossible! I would have known about anything like that."

"But you still don't know why she killed herself, do you?"

Aaron Stone blinked his tired eyes. "You haven't enough criminals to go after, Captain? You have to come around here making more trouble?" There was an angry sorrow in his voice.

"I just thought there might be a connection," Leopold said, his voice soft, almost apologetic. "Thanks for your time."

They went outside, back to the car, and Leopold kicked at a pile of dead leaves by the curb. Autumn was always a time for regretting things undone, or overdone.

"What do you think, Captain?" Fletcher asked.

"Who knows? Maybe the guy's right. Maybe it's like I said before, about confusing the villains with the victims."

"Only doing our job, Captain."

Leopold sighed and started the car. "I know, Fletcher. You said that before."

It was dark when they reached headquarters, and Patrolman Hank Duffy was just coming out the back door, caught somewhere in that limbo of off-duty hours when there were always reports to be filed or testimony to be given.

"Captain, the owner of the apartment house was down earlier," he said. "I showed him Snuffy's loot. Hope it was right."

"Sure, as long as he didn't steal any of it."

Duffy hesitated on the step. "It seemed to upset him."

"The cocaine?"

"The lab boys still have that. No, I mean the rest of the stuff. It really made him uptight."

"People sometimes act that way when they've been robbed. Go home and get some sleep, Hank."

The officer grinned tiredly. "I've had my four hours. No. I'm going back on duty."

They went upstairs. Leopold's office at the rear of the second floor, and he glanced through the accumulation of messages and reports on his desk. "I suppose I'd better take a look at Snuffy's loot, too," he said finally.

"It's beginning to look like a job for Narcotics rather than Violent Crimes, Captain."

Leopold nodded. "I'll turn it over to them after I examine Snuffy's loot."

Fletcher came back with a cardboard box and they spread the things on the table by Leopold's window. A piggy bank painted with daisies, a tangled cluster of costume jewelry, a target pistol, a portable tape recorder, a clock-radio. "Nothing unusual here, Captain. We'll probably give it back to the robbery victims tomorrow."

Leopold shook the piggy bank and then opened the bottom, letting the half dollars spill out. "The cocaine couldn't have been hidden in any of these things, could it?"

"Not a chance, Captain. The package is bigger than a brick."

Leopold's fingers were busy untangling Miss Shipley's jewelry. Several of the pieces had the monogram S on them, and a few had LS. He studied them for a time and then lifted the target pistol to see if it was loaded. It was not.

Leopold put down the pistol. "Come on, Fletcher. I've got an idea."

"You know where the cocaine came from?"

"Right now that's the least of my worries."

It was just after eight o'clock when they pulled up in front of Aaron Stone's apartment house. The place was ablaze with lights now, as houses usually were immediately after a successful burglary. Stone didn't answer his bell, and neither did Miss Shipley, but they had better luck with Nelson. He came to the door in his pajamas, rubbing the sleep from his eyes.

"I gotta go to work in a few hours. Can't a guy get some rest around here?"

"We're looking for Miss Shipley," Leopold said.

"If she's not home she probably went to the movies."

"The movies?"

"Stone is always giving us free passes to his theater."

Leopold nodded and started down the steps.

"We're going to the movies?" Fletcher asked.

Leopold nodded. "To the movies."

The picture had already started and the theater was dark as they entered and brushed past the ticket taker. Aaron Stone was not at the candy counter, and the manager's office was empty. "Where is he?" Leopold asked.

The youth at the door looked scared. "Mr. Stone? He runs the projector. Is this a raid?"

Leopold glanced at the dancing images on the screen. "Not yet."

There were perhaps a dozen people in the darkened theater, mere heads silhouetted against the screen. None of them looked like Miss Shipley. "Where is she, Captain?" Fletcher asked.

"Maybe upstairs with Stone. Come on."

They made their way up a narrow staircase to a door marked: No Admittance. It was locked and Leopold pounded on it, not worrying about the noise. After a moment Aaron Stone appeared. "You can't come in here," he said.

"We're in," Leopold told him. The projection room was small and hot, with a shaded bulb giving enough light to show them the two bulky metal monsters that hummed and fumed and alternately gave life to the screen below. There were open film cans on a table, and fat reels of 35-millimeter movie film waiting their turn at the projectors.

"What do you want?" Stone asked, leaning awkwardly to one side as if pulled down by a weight in his pocket. "Can't you see I'm working?" He turned to peer out the little window of the booth, watching the screen until the mark in the upper right corner signaled him to switch to the other projector. One monster died and the other came alive, with no break in the action below. On the screen a half-naked girl continued running through a field of tall grass.

"Where's Miss Shipley?" Leopold asked. "Nelson said she might be here."

"Haven't seen her. My projectionist quit last week and I've been stuck up here."

"I wanted to ask you something more about the robbery."

"Still on that? Still trying to tie the cocaine to me?"

"To your house."

"I don't know a thing about it."

"Then let me ask you about your wife's suicide," Leopold said quietly, staring down at the screen where the half-naked girl had given way to a rural wedding party.

"What about it?"

Leopold glanced around at Fletcher. "Wait for me downstairs. I won't be long."

"What about it?" Stone repeated when they were alone.

But Leopold did not answer immediately. His eyes were on the movie screen, watching the images dance about with a life of their own. "I suppose," he said at last, "that a man could come to think of himself as something of a god if he stayed up here long enough, running the projectors and giving those people life."

"Do you have something to say to me, Captain?"

Leopold turned to face him in the dimly lit booth. "I have a great deal to say to you, Mr. Stone. First I'll say that you have a pistol in the pocket of your pants. I can see its outline quite clearly through the fabric."

"I—"

"You were planning to kill Miss Shipley, weren't you?"

"How did you know that?"

"It's my business to know things, Mr. Stone. They said the sight of the robbery loot upset you, and I wondered why. Then I looked it over and I saw what you saw. The costume jewelry stolen from Paula Shipley's bedroom did not belong to her, did it? The initials on some pieces were not PS, but LS. Not Paula Shipley, but Linda Stone."

"She stole it!" Aaron Stone puttered. Behind him, the projector hummed and flickered.

"I don't think so, or the sight of it wouldn't have upset you quite that much. Your wife gave that jewelry to Paula Shipley; didn't she? Nelson told me about the parties, about the things Miss Shipley did. Your wife got too deeply involved with her, and suicide was the only way out. You never knew it, did you? Not till today when you saw that jewelry."

"No," he mumbled, and his eyes began to water. "I never knew it. I always thought she killed herself because of me."

"Give me the gun," Leopold said quietly.

"What?"

"Give me the gun. You aren't going to use it."

"No," Stone said. "I suppose not." He slipped the pistol from his pocket and handed it over. "But how did you know I was planning to kill her?"

"Mr. Stone, if it had been my wife, I'd have been thinking of murder, too."

He went downstairs then, to where Fletcher was waiting. "Pretty good picture, Captain. Want to stay for it?"

"Not tonight, Fletcher."

"What happened? Did you solve it?"

"I did better than that, Fletcher. I prevented it."

"Huh?"

In the outer lobby they found Paula Shipley just entering, about to use one of her free passes. Leopold took her gently by the arm and turned her toward the door. "Come on, Miss Shipley," he said, in a voice both quiet and firm. "You're too late for the movie tonight. We'll drive you home."

In the morning Fletcher poked his head into Leopold's office. "Come across the hall, Captain," he said with a grin. "I've got something that'll interest you."

Leopold followed him to the Interrogation Room and saw that it was Sue Dwyer, sitting in the same chair she'd occupied the previous morning. But there was something different about her this time. Her left eye was bruised and blackened, swollen shut. "Tell the Captain what you told me," Fletcher said.

She turned to Leopold, her voice barely a whisper. "Nothing like this ever happened to me before. He never beat me before!"

"Who beat you?" Leopold asked.

"My boy friend. When I told him what I did."

"That you killed a man with your car?"

"No, about the cocaine. After the accident I was afraid the police would find it in the glove compartment. So when the officer went to radio for an ambulance I slipped it into the bag that burglar was carrying."

"I see," Leopold said.

"I know it was worth a lot of money, but he didn't have to beat me!"

"Well," Leopold said, trying not to look at Fletcher. "suppose you tell us all about it."

CURRENT MYSTERY AND SUSPENSE HARDCOVERS

AUTHOR	TITLE	PUBLISHER	PRICE	ON SALE
Creasey, John	VOTE FOR THE TOFF	Walker & Co.	4.95	11/8
Hubin, Allen J. (Editor)	BEST OF THE BEST DETECTIVE STORIES (Twenty-fifth Anniversary Collection)	E. P. Dutton	6.95	Nov.
Johnson, E. Richard	CASE LOAD — MAXIMUM	Harper & Row	5.95	11/17
Lockridge, Richard	DEATH IN A SUNNY PLACE	J. B. Lippincott	5.50	12/7
Mann, Jessica	A CHARITABLE END	McKay-Washburn	4.95	11/1
Marric, J. J.	GIDEON'S ART	Harper & Row	5.95	11/24
Masur, Harold O. (Editor)	MURDER MOST FOUL (The 1971 Mystery Writers of America)	Walker & Co.	5.95	11/30

Titles and Data Supplied by the Publishers

A possible explanation of one of the most baffling, heartrending and significant murder mysteries of our time . . .

AGONY COLUMN

by BARRY N. MALZBERG

gentlemen:

I enclose my short story, Three for the Universe, and hope you will find it right for your magazine, Astounding Spirits.

Yours very truly,
Martin Miller

Dear Contributor:

Thank you for your recent submission. Unfortunately, though we have read it with great interest, we are unable to use it in Astounding Spirits. Due to the great volume of submissions we receive we cannot grant all contributors a personal letter, but you may be sure that the manuscript has been reviewed carefully and its rejection is no comment upon its literary merit but may be dependent upon one of many other factors.

Faithfully,
The Editors

Dear Editors:

The Vietnam disgrace must be brought to an end! We have lost a that stained soil not only our national honor but our very nature. The troops must be brought home and we must remember that there is more honor in dissent than in unquestioning silent acquiescence.

Sincerely,
Martin Miller

Dear Sir:

Thank you for your recent letter to the Editors. Due to the great volume of worthy submissions we are unable to print every good letter we receive and therefore regretfully inform you that while we will not be publishing it this is no comment upon the value of your opinion.

© 1971 by Barry N. Malzberg.

Very truly yours,
The Editors

Dear Congressman Forthwaite:

I wish to bring your attention to a serious situation which is developing on the West Side. A resident of this neighborhood for five years now, I have recently observed that a large number of streetwalkers, dope addicts, and criminal types are loitering at the intersection of Columbus Avenue and 72nd Street at almost all hours of the day, offending passers-by with their appearance and creating a severe blight on the area. In addition, passers-by are often threateningly asked for "handouts" and even "solicited." I know that you, with me, share a concern for a Better West Side and look forward to your comments on this situation as well as some kind of concrete action.

Sincerely,
Martin Miller

Dear Mr. Millow:

Thank you for your letter. Your concern for our West Side is appreciated and it is only through the efforts and diligence of constituents such as yourself that a better New York can be conceived. I have forwarded your letter to the appropriate precinct office in Manhattan and you may expect to hear from them shortly.

Yours truly,
Alwyn D. Forthwaite

Dear Gentlemen:

In May of this year I wrote Congressman Alwyn D. Forthwaite a letter of complaint concerning conditions on the Columbus Avenue-West 72nd Street intersection in Manhattan and was informed by him that this letter was passed on to your precinct office. Since four months have now elapsed and since I have neither heard from you nor observed any change in the conditions pointed out in my letter, I now write to ask whether or not that letter was forwarded to you and what you intend to do about it.

Sincerely,
Martin Miller

Dear Mr. Milner:

Our files hold no record of your letter. .

Yours truly,

N. B. Karsh

Captain, #33462

Dear Sirs:

I have read Sheldon Novack's article in the current issue of Cry with great interest, but feel that I must take issue with his basic point which is that sex is the consuming biological drive from which all other activities stem and which said other activities become only metaphorical for. This strikes me as a bit more of a projection of Mr. Novack's own functioning than that reality which he so shrewdly contends he apperceives.

Sincerely,

Martin Miller

Dear Mr. Milton:

Due to the great number of responses to Sheldon A. Novack's Sex and Sexuality: Is It All Repressive? in the August issue of Cry, we will be unable to publish your own contribution in our Cry from the City column, but we thank you for your interest.

Yours,

The Editors

Dear Mr. President:

I was shocked by the remarks apparently attributed to you in today's newspaper on the public assistance situation. Surely you must be aware of the fact that social welfare legislation emerged from the compassionate attempt of 1930 politics to deal with human torment in the systematized fashion and although many of the cruelties you note are inherent to the very system, they do not cast doubt upon its very legitimacy. Our whole national history has been one of coming to terms with collective consciousness as opposed to the law of the jungle and I cannot understand how you could have taken such a position as you did.

Sincerely,

Martin Miller

Dear Mr. Meller:

Thank you very much for your letter of October 18th to the President. We appreciate your expression of interest and assure you that without the concern of citizens like yourself the United States would not be the great country it has become. Thank you very much and we do look forward to hearing from you in the future on matters of national interest.

Mary L. McGinnity
Presidential Assistant

Gentlemen:

I enclose herewith my article, Welfare: Myth or Fact? which I hope you may find suitable for publication in Insight Magazine.

Very truly yours,
Martin Miller

Dear Contributor:

The enclosed has been carefully reviewed and our reluctant decision is that it does not quite meet our needs at the present time. Thank you for your interest in Insight.

The Editors

Dear Senator Partch,

Your vote on the Armament Legislation was shameful.

Sincerely,
Martin Miller

Dear Dr. Mallow:

Thank you for your recent letter to Senator O. Stuart Partch and for your interest in the Senator's recent voting record.

L. T. Walters
Congressional Aide

Dear Susan Saltis:

I think your recent decision to pose nude in that "art photography" series in Men's Companion was disgraceful, filled once again with those timeless, empty rationalizations of the licentious which have so little intrinsic capacity for damage except when they are subsumed, as they are in your case, with abstract and vague "connections" to platitudes so enormous as to risk the very demolition of the collective personality.

Yours very truly,
Martin Miller

Dear Sir:

With pleasure and in answer to your request, we are enclosing a photograph of Miss Susan Saltis as she appears in her latest movie, Chariots to the Holy Roman Empire."

Very truly yours,
Henry T. Wyatt
Publicity Department

Gentlemen:

I wonder if Cry would be interested in the enclosed article which is not so much an article as a true documentary of the results which have been obtained from my efforts, over recent months, to correspond with various public figures, entertainment stars, etc., etc. It is frightening to intimate the obliteration of self which the very devices of the 20th Century compel, and perhaps our readers might share my (not so retrospective) horror.

Sincerely,
Martin Miller

Dear Sir:

As a potential contributor to Cry I am happy to offer you our Writer's Subscription Discount." For $5.50 you will receive not only a full year's subscription to Cry (28% below newsstand rates, 4% below customary subscriptions) but in addition our year-end special issue, Cry in the Void, at no extra charge.

Subscription Dept.

Dear Contributor:

Thank you very much for submitting your article entitled Alienation. It has been considered here with great interest and it is the consensus of the Editorial Board that while it has unusual merit it is not quite for us. We thank you for your interest in Cry and look forward to seeing more of your work in the future.

Sincerely,
The Editors

Dear Congressman Forthwaite:

Nothing has been done about the conditions I mentioned in my letter of almost a year ago. Not one single thing!

Bitterly,
Martin Miller

Dear Mr. Mill:

Please accept our apologies for being so late in answering your good letter of March 25th. Congressman Forthwaite has been involved, as you know, in the Food Investigations and has on necessity allowed some of his important correspondence to await his detailed attention.

He thanks you for your warm expressions of interest.

Yours truly,

Ann Ananauris
Secretary

Dear Sir:

The Adams multiple-murders are indeed interesting, not only for their violence, but because of the confession of the accused that he "did it so that someone would take notice of me." Any citizen can understand this—the desperate need to be recognized as an individual, to break past bureaucracy into some clear apprehension of one's self-worth, is one of the most basic of human drives but is becoming increasingly frustrated today by a technocracy which allows less and less latitude for the individual to articulate his own identity and vision and be heard. Murder is easy; it is easy in the sense that the murderer does not need to embark upon an arduous course of training in order to accomplish his feat; his excess can come from the simple extension of sheer human drives aided by basic weaponry. The murderer does not have to cultivate "contacts" or "fame" but can simply, by being there, vault past nihilism and into some clear, cold connection with the self. More and more, the capacity for murder lurks within us; we are narrow and driven, we are almost obliterated from any sense of existence; we need to make that singing leap past accomplishment and into acknowledgement. Perhaps you would print this letter?

Dear Sir:

Thank you for your recent letter. We regret being unable to use it due to many letters of similar nature being received, but we look forward to your expression of interest.

Sincerely,

N. Burnside

Editor, Books Section

ar Mr. President:

I intend to assassinate you and swear to you that you will not e out the year. It will come by rifle or knife, horn or fire, dread water, but it will come, and there is no way you can Avoid that dgement to be Rendered upon you.

Seriously,
Martin Miller

ar Mr. Miller:

As you know, the President is abroad at the time of this writing t you may rest assured that upon his return your letter, along th thousands of other similar expressions of interest, will be med over to him, and I am sure that he will appreciate your ving written.

Very truly yours,
Mary L. McGinnity
Presidential Assistant

DEPARTMENT OF "FIRST STORIES"

This is the 361st "first story" to be published by Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine . . . a sprightly tale, brightly tooled breezily told . . .

While an English major at Santa Barbara City College, Santa Barbara, California, the author, Raymond D. Stenzel, has some of his writing published in the college literary magazine and in 1968 he was judged the best creative writer on campus. For the next three years he "held down a series of jobs ranging from sailmaker to motorcycle salesman, and slowly filled a ragged cardboard box with stories, parts of The Great American Novel, a small collection of rejection slips, an encouraging notes" — the last written by himself to himself.

Mr. Stenzel calls himself "a cliché." He doesn't "quite live in a garret here in Berkeley, but most of the other bromides concerning the struggling writer seem to apply." Perhaps the do — now. But we'd bet that this bright new writer will "make it" . . .

THE CASE OF THE UNTRACEABLE GUNS

by RAYMOND D. STENZEL

Consider the double-barreled shotgun.

This classic weapon, in one form or another, has been around a good while, but it took a bird-blasting English gunsmith named Henry Nock to bring out the real potential of the shotgun. Henry felt there were some serious drawbacks in the design of his favorite flintlock, such as being slow fire and having very heavy and unwieldy barrels. Henry felt was a day's work just to draw bead on an unsuspecting prey. So he put his cunning English mind to work on the problem and came up with a new breech design that not only duced a spectacular increase in rate of fire, but resulted in a reduction in barrel lengths, with consequent loss of weight. A great number of pigeons left the island.

© 1971 by Raymond D. Stenzel.

Henry Nock's new design did not endear him to the bird population of Seventeenth Century England, but he had made a double-gun practical. And therein lies the charm and versatility of the double-barrel shotgun. Practicality. Before Henry's time, the versatile double-barrel has been many things. The double-barrel function at weddings has been some part of American folklore. It has produced a few heroes here and there. Ask the Mafia. Its members call it the lupera, and it is a favorite ceremonial-making instrument for the Sicilian social club.

Fred Wenton knew nothing of all these fascinating historical particulars concerning the shotgun. He was not large on the Seventeenth Century gun-stands, but he knew a little bit about the Mafia, having occasionally supplied the lupera to one or another grim gentleman who came calling at the back door in the dead of the night.

"Knock, knock.

Who's there?"

The Mafia. Gimme a gun."

Right. Here. Two hundred dollars, please."

"Right. Mil grazie, Fred."

"You're welcome, Dominic."

Fred might read in the newspapers a day or so later of the sudden demise of one of his fellow human beings, but that was none of his business. His business was supplying shotguns. He would supply other types of guns now and then, but primarily the basic twelve-gauge was his staple item. He knew that none of the weapons he supplied could ever be traced back to him, for his methods of acquiring his lethal stock-in-trade were dim and subtle, and he never, never bought back a gun once he had sold it at his back door.

This situation of untraceable guns naturally drove various members of law-enforcement agencies crazy. Every time they went out to investigate a violent demise, they invariably recovered enough evidence in the form of slugs, pellets, bullets, and other flattened-out pieces of metal to ascertain positively that they came from one particular weapon and no other. That was nice, because they always recovered a weapon, too.

These facts should have made the police very happy, for the science of ballistics and the identification of weapons being what it is today, assiduous examination of the recovered gun should have given the hard-working police scientists some results, such as where the weapon originated, which in turn should have given the hard-working investigating officers A Clue to the persons obtaining said weapon.

Fat chance.

It was as if the persons causing the particular demise had procured their instrument out of thin air, used it once, and tossed it away like an empty beer can. As a matter of fact, a beer can might have been easier to work with than the guns the police were faced with. Serial numbers were gone so completely that even acid would not bring them out of the metal; barrels had been changed; automatics had been modified; revolvers didn't revolve; shotguns—ah, shotguns. Old bird-shooting Henry Nock wouldn't have recognized one of his little toys after businessman Fred Wenton got through with it.

The situation, as noted, disturbed the mental equilibrium of law officers considerably.

"It's driving me nuts!" stated Phil Stone, one of the more excitable cops in the detective section of Midwest City's police force. He was a hard-driving, cigar-smoking, dedicated cop who stood five feet eleven inches tall in heavy brogues. He had received two departmental citations for bravery, and he had an eagle tattooed on his left forearm. He was a proud cop, and a good one. A little excitable, that's Detective Stone's excitability was taking place at the scene of the latest discovery of a victim who had encountered several dozen buckshot. The fact that the shot had been traveling in excess of 100 feet per second undoubtedly counted for the general misfortune of his physical condition. Also the fact that he was still breathing.

"Gently, Phil, gently," replied Stone's partner, Detective Roger Weems. He rose from kneeling position beside the body and patted Stone soothingly on the shoulder.

"Gently my Aunt Fanny shot back Stone pithily. "This is the ninth hood this morning who's been wiped out by shotgun. The eight before that one were hit by eight different shotguns and it's a safe bet one will be, too."

Detective Weems looked confused. "Phil, he's already been—"

"I know that, dummy! I see, can't I? Shotgun! A different shotgun will be—h dammit, Roger!" Stone stomped angrily out of motel room wherein lay hood number nine, leaking all over the threadbare carpet. Weems shrugged, philosophic resignation written all over his long,ony face. He gestured to the men to continue their work n and around the body, and allowed his partner outside.

"Outside" was the parking rea for a somewhat rundown motel just inside the city limits. he two detectives had arrived t the motel a half hour earlier, aving been the only team available at headquarters when e squeal concerning the late umber nine had come in. In ccordance with police practice, atching the squeal also made em responsible for the ensu-ig investigation. It was remark-oly bad luck that they had also aught all eight of the previous otgunning squeals.

Weems found Stone sourly bserving the half-dozen patrol-en summoned to the scene ho were searching the im-mediate area for clues and/or e murder weapon. Not that ther would do much good, one thought. The weapon ould undoubtedly be another ntraceable shotgun and a clue ould have to have a sign on it ying I AM A CLUE before y of these—

"They find anything yet, il?" Weems's voice broke into s thoughts.

"Nah." Stone was soothing his jagged nerves and polluting the air with a ten-cent cigar. "They all need seeing-eye dogs."

Weems was about to answer when he saw one of the blue-clad patrolmen lurch and fall headfirst into the bushes bordering one of the motel cabins. Fluent blasphemy mingled with the crashing of branches as the patrolman floundered about trying to regain his feet.

"See what I mean?" snorted Stone disgustedly.

"Mack Sennett would have loved these guys."

"He's carrying something, Phil. Looks like a—"

"Don't tell me. A shotgun."

A few hours later the two detectives stood around a long table in the headquarters laboratory listening to a technician summarizing what exhaustive tests on the recovered shotgun had revealed. The weapon itself lay on the table in bits and pieces.

The technician was a short broad little man named Gould. He was an expert in laboratory analysis. He was expert because he had gone to school. He knew things. His was a keen, analytical mind that attacked each problem his fellow officers brought him with educated expertise and conscientious dispatch. He administered his tests, compared his various cross-index files, consulted his many complex charts, and came up with intelligent conclusions to aid his brother officers.

"What we have here," declared Gould expertly, "is a shotgun."

Stone and Weems glanced at each other. A small identical sigh escaped from each man. Their patient stares returned to Gould.

The little man was oblivious. He had got to be expert by being thorough.

"This shotgun," he continued, "is a rather old one, apparently manufactured around 1928 or so. Though all identifying marks and numbers have been removed, the styling is that of an Ithaca, what is commonly known as a trap-and-field gun. It has undergone extensive modifications, probably in an attempt to disguise it and also make it more readily—"

"Gould," said Stone.

"—portable. The barrels have been sawed off, the stock replaced with a wire frame arrangement—"

"Gould," said Weems.

"—and there appears to be—"

"GOULD!" said Stone and Weems.

"What?"

"Can this gun be traced back to anyone? Do your files show a match in the slugs? Was it sold in Midwest City? Can we find out who owned it?"

Gould looked at the disassembled weapon on the table, looked at the ceiling, looked back at the waiting detectives, and shook his head. He watched dispiritedly as the two men walked out. He knew they were on the way to the Chief's office to report another untraceable gun. He turned back to his table and idly moved the pieces of the gun around.

"Where did you come from, gun?" he said softly.

"How do I know where they come from?" shouted Chief of Police Sanders into his telephone. While he shouted, his eyes never left the uncomfortable figures of Stone and Weems standing in a sort of loose parade rest in front of his desk. The two could hear faint ducklike sounds coming from the Chief's receiver.

"Charlie, there are no records of those guns being sold anywhere in the area, the teletype to other cities came up with nothing, the F.B.I. doesn't make them, and we don't have the time or the facilities to investigate every gun store in every state to try to match up weapons that ha the time we're not even sure started out as weapons! Now, tell your editor he should be happy it's hoods getting wiped out and not law-abiding citizens! We're working on it!"

Sanders slammed the phone back on its cradle and glared at it. He looked up. "Well, speak."

Stone spread his hands in a gesture of futility. "Same old story, Chief," he said. "A different gun, and untraceable. That makes—"

"I know how many it makes, Stone," said the Chief in a low dangerous voice. "I am tired of the war we have going on in this city, gentlemen. I am tired of it, the Commissioner is tired of it, the citizenry are tired of it, the—"

"I imagine George the Fink was tired of it, too, Chief," interrupted Weems brightly.

"And who might George the Fink be, Weems?"

"He's the latest hood what got shot, Chief," said Weems, smiling.

"Weems?"

"Yes, sir?"

"Shut up."

"Yes, sir."

"The thing is, Chief," interposed Stone, "that we don't seem to have a way of stopping the war. Johnson's mob is bound and determined to move in on Edwards' territory and Edwards ain't having any. So they're shootin' the bejabbers out of each other. Everytime we round up a bunch of 'em, their lawyers have them right back out on the streets again. None of them are carrying guns, none of them are breaking the law."

"Murder is against the law, Stone."

"I know that, Chief, but how are we gonna pin it on the slobs? There's never been an eyewitness yet and there's not likely to be as long as the pattern keeps up the way it has."

"The ambushing, you mean," said Sanders.

"Yeah. Instead of out-and-out battles they're tracking each other down until one guy spots another's hideout and blooey! that's all she wrote. Personally, I say good riddance."

The Chief chuckled. It was a bitter sound, but nonetheless, it was mirth.

"So would I, Stone, but it is making us look bad. As long as they have a supply of guns that we can't connect up with them, we're going to keep on looking bad. And that's got to stop, understand?"

"We understand, Chief. Both mobs are doing the same thing, so Weems and I figure they've got to be using the same source, unbeknownst to each other."

"Find me that source, Stone. We've got to get those hoods back to carrying their own guns so we can arrest them when they shoot somebody. Find me that source!"

At that moment the source was quite a few states away from the irate Chief of Police. The source was minding his own business, which at the moment consisted of combing his thinning gray hair. Fred Wenton's reflection in the mirror showed him a somewhat plump, fiftyish individual, with guileless blue eyes and a general demeanor of well-being. All in all, he felt, a picture of a slightly more than well-to-do businessman who perhaps traveled a lot. Which was natural, he did travel a lot.

Fred finished combing his hair and left the restroom of the service station where he had stopped to fill up his micro-bus. He settled his bill and carefully entered the stream of south-bound traffic.

At about the same time that Stone and Weems were sitting glumly down to an early supper before hitting the streets to try once again to make some sense out of their case, Fred Wenton carefully drove his bus up a rutted dirt road that led crookedly to a ramshackle farmhouse somewhere in Georgia. As he turned off the engine, several long and skinny hounds ambled out to sniff at the tires and howl mournful imprecations at the early evening sky. He quieted them down with soothing words born of long practise in dealing with Southern houndhood, and made his way to the rickety front porch.

"Hold 'er right there, mister," said a voice from within.

Unsurprised, Wenton stopped, holding out his hands to show they were empty. At these moments Fred felt he was back in frontier days, when the weary wayfarer often took his life in his hands as he approached a homestead after dark. In a way, he was; you average Southern cracker has a long memory. He also is poor and therefore hangs onto what little he has, passing on what property he has managed to accumulate over the years to his sons, who in turn hang onto it some more before finally passing it on to their sons. The knowledge of this ingrained habit was making Fred Wenton a rich man.

"I should like to discuss a little business with you, my good man," said Fred. He approached the door and proffered a small oblong of white cardboard.

The lank specimen of suspicious Southern sharecropper took the card and peered at it.

"Auntie-kews? What's them?"

"Allow me to explain, my dear fellow," said Fred, suavely shoring himself into the house. One pronounces the word n-teeks, the word meaning—"the door closed behind him. Outside, the skinny hounds scratched and swore at each other.

An hour and some minutes later Fred Wenton was on the road again, heading for another isolated farm farther up the mountain. Carefully stored in the back were a kerosene lamp, complete with chimney and black trimmer, a well-used butter churn, one worn-out mule, circa 1890, and one twelve-gauge double-barreled shotgun, circa 1910.

Back at the tiny farm he had just left, the lank cracker turned from counting the crisp bills Fred had given him to face his equally lank wife.

"That feller musta been crazy, Berthie," he growled. "Ain't good money fer them dumb things. Why, I cain't even remember where I got that old shotgun—it's been kickin' around here fer years."

"I hope it blows up in his eye," snarled Berthie savagely. "Why'd you hafta go and sell yone and only butter churn, n' ye?"

"Aw, shet yer dern mouth, man."

Eventually Fred Wenton returned home. As the microbus swung into the crushed gravel driveway of Fred's combination home and place of business, its headlights illuminated the tasteful clapboard sign he had erected on the front lawn. In a bold Spencerian script the black letters spelled out: Frederick Wenton, Antiques.

As he unloaded his gleanings of aged Southern Americana, Fred was looking forward with pleasure to getting down to his basement workshop with certain of his trophies, there to work his unique brand of magic. He had in mind a fine Parker Knockabout he had picked up in Waycross. That should take very well to his basic sculpturing instrument, a Shur-Cut hacksaw.

Had Fred Wenton, hacksawer extraordinary, known the part his fine Parker Knockabout would play in his future life, he would have melted the thing down to slag forthwith. But he didn't, so he spent several happy hours in his workshop filing, sawing, rearranging, and generally transmogrifying the stately old shotgun into a cut-down, compact, contemporary cannon.

The blued-steel double barrels, originally 30 inches long, now measured less than 12. The superbly tapered stock, with its ritzy Monte Carlo comb, had been brutally hacked off and replaced with a pistol grip from a German machine pistol, and the distinctive Parker trigger guard was gone altogether. Only an expert eye could now tell what the little blaster had once been. Fred thought, proudly, that it was one of his best efforts.

In due course the much-modified Knockabout went into underworld circulation, via the knock-knock route at Fred's back door. Shortly thereafter a two-bit hood from the Johnson mob went out of circulation. Permanently.

Once again Stone and Weems found themselves in technician Gould's laboratory. Both detectives were showing signs of strain, but Gould was all but bubbling with good spirits.

"Well, you boys have quite a find this time," said Gould. "As you may know, I've had to do a lot of studying and research on shotguns since all this started. Did you know a guy named Henry Nock invented—?"

"What have you got, Gould?" interrupted Stone heavily.

"You certainly don't have to get huffy about it," sniffed Gould. "To begin: it's a very fine old Parker Knockabout. Unlike most of the weapons you've brought me, this number is of such quality manufacture that it couldn't be completely disguised. In the old days, when this one was made, the old gunsmiths used laminated steel and Circassian walnut—"

In that part of his brain which made Stone such a good detective, something went click.

"Gould, why do you keep saying 'old' like that?" asked, his eyes narrowed intently.

"Because it is. You don't see many of these around much."

"The one before this was made around 1928, didn't you say?"

"Why, yes, I suppose I did. But this—"

Excitement began to creep into Stone's voice. "How about the ones before that? Were they old, too?"

"Why, it's hard to say. Two or three of them were certainly old, but there's really no way to tell exactly when most of them were made. They were disguised, you see."

"Old guns," said Stone, looking at Weems narrowly.

"Old shotguns," said Weems, looking narrowly back at Stone.

"Are you guys having a wild surmise?" asked Gould. Ilevity was wasted; his audience of two was gone.

In police parlance it egoing is usually referred to A Break. This means that the estigators have finally put urther some related facts, or ind a common denominator, l come up with a definite ad. Logically, one would ipose, Stone would imdiately head for the teletype ts and begin inquiries as to es of new shotguns anywhere hin a reasonable area around lwest City. Since all these 'shotguns were cluttering up ice headquarters, presu-my they had also cluttered up neone's home at one time, l presumably the home ners would wish to replace ir old—but you see what is ant.

But, perhaps because of ne's excitability, or the ain of the long investigation, both, the detectives did not this. They had their nmon denominator—that all murder weapons (well, ne of them, anyway) were —and that could mean only e thing.

They went out and arrested the director of the local seum.

The bewildered official ldn't believe it. Here were o gimlet-eyed, hard-faced ectives accusing him of plying old shotguns to the y's underworld. Ridiculous. "That's ridiculous!" stated the director, with some feeling. "The museum does have a collection of historical weapons, to be sure, but I certainly am not selling them to the Cosa Nostril!"

"Cosa Nostra," corrected Weems. "Let's search the joint, Phil. Up against the wall, you!"

"Wait a minute, Roger," said Stone. His excitement had cooled somewhat in the dignified atmosphere of the museum. Now that he thought it over, it did seem a little far-fetched, common denominator or no.

"Mr. Director, where do you get the guns for your collection?" he asked. "Specifically, your old shotguns?"

"Shotguns? Shotguns. Well, some we receive from private collections, of course. We get some nice pieces that way. Primarily, though, our field men procure examples of American weaponry directly from private individuals who—"

"Field men?" said Stone.

"Private individuals?" said Weems.

"Yes. Our representatives travel about constantly, visiting areas in the country where families retain artifacts of the past as a matter of course. When they discover something of historical value, they endeavor to acquire it for the museum. Shotguns, since you ask, are obtained primarily from the Southern states, where they are passed on as legacies. They sometimes figure prominently in local disputes, called—ah, feuds, I believe.”

“Do private collectors get them the same way?”

“That would be a reasonable assumption, yes.”

“Ah, ha,” said Stone.

“I don’t get it,” said Weems.

“Never mind, Roger. Just pack a bag—we’re going on a little trip.”

“Where to?”

“South.”

The long and skinny hounds were still scratching and casting nasty aspersions in hound language when Stone and Weems arrived at the end of a rutted farm road somewhere in Georgia. The two men had been directed to this homestead by the owner of a gun shop in a nearby hamlet, who had recently sold a new twelve-gauge to the resident sharecropper. This was their fifth stop, the first four sharecroppers having proved to be exceedingly uncooperative, in that none had recognized the revamped Parker Knockabout.

“You ever seen this gun before, mister?” asked Weems hopefully, extending the gun to the lank personage who peered at him through a crack in the warped door.

After a short silence growling voice replied, “I see part of it afore. Them barrel and forepiece there is off an old scattergun.” Weems heard a sort of liquid blurring sound the sharecropper turned his head and spat tobacco juice somewhere inside the house.

“How can you tell?”

“Cause them there barrel is steel and that there forepiece is made out of walnut. Any feller knows that. I got a new one, ain’t nearly as good. I wish now I hadn’t sold ’er to that aunty-kews feller.”

The confused expression came back to Weems’s face. “You sold your gun to your aunt?”

The man turned his head again. Blurt. He turned back wiping his whiskery mouth with the back of his hand. With the other he fished around in his overalls and handed Weems a dirty oblong of cardboard.

Reading over Weems’s shoulder, Stone made out in bold Spencerian script on a card: Frederick Wenton, Antiques, and a Midwest City address. Jubilantly the detectives leaped from the sagging porch and trotted toward the car. Halfway there, a snarl and a feminine voice hailed them.

“Hey, when you see that feller, ask him kin I have a butter churn back, will ye?”

A story that could be called "A Crime of Our Time"... The crime is murder, but the question arises: Was the crime committed by Juan Diego, or was it committed against him? Judge for yourself...

THE HOT TAMALES MURDER CASE

by J. F. PEIRCE

There was a lull in the trial. The prosecuting and defense attorneys had approached the bench and were discussing a point of law with the judge, speaking in low tones that reached me as a murmur. From my vantage point in the jury box I took the opportunity to study the defendant.

His name was Juan Diego. He was a Chicano, a Mexican-American, and from his appearance more Indian than Spanish. He sat, as he had throughout the trial, with his hands folded, with a quiet dignity that verged on the Stoic. He was a small, tightly knit man and wore an old-fashioned walrus mustache that accented the downcast expression of his mahogany face and his sad brown eyes.

He was dressed in an expensive banker's-gray suit, a reminder of the days when he was reputed to have been a multimillionaire. It was hard to believe that this soft-spoken, mild-mannered little man had once been a business tycoon. It was even harder to believe that he was now a murderer, that he had killed a man apparently without provocation, a man he had known less than fifteen minutes.

I remembered the first day of the trial, as he stood with his lawyer facing the judge, while the charge was read against him.

"How does the defendant plead?" the judge asked. "Guilty or not guilty?"

Juan Diego's lawyer answered for him. "Not guilty, your Honor, by reason of temporary insanity."

There was no sign of insanity in Juan Diego's eyes or face now. Certainly he was aware of everything that was going on. He had been an excellent, an intelligent witness in his own behalf, speaking simply, directly, answering all questions in a straightforward manner.

© 1971 by J. F. Peirce.

I tried to weave a pattern from the threads of testimony that had been given by the various witnesses.

The facts of the case were unchallenged. Juan Diego had killed a man. No one denied that, least of all Juan Diego. "I regret it very much," he said, "as Christ is my witness. May God forgive me. I cannot forgive myself."

The man, a stranger, had entered Juan Diego's small, cluttered, home-owned grocery store located beneath his family living quarters in the Mexican section of the town. The man had purchased a pack of cigarettes, eaten a homemade hot tamale, and exchanged a few words with Juan Diego, commenting on the tamale's excellent quality; whereupon Juan Diego had pulled a revolver from under the counter, where he kept it as "insurance against a possible holdup," and shot the man dead.

"He kept pulling the trigger even after the gun was emptied," a customer who had witnessed the murder testified. "It kept going click, click, click until I took it away from him."

Though I pride myself on my imagination, I could not "see" this humble little man standing over a bloody corpse, mechanically pulling the trigger of the pearl-handled revolver that had been introduced into evidence as "Exhibit A."

According to the testimony read into the record, the events of that fateful fifteen minutes had had their beginning some two years earlier. They had begun in a strangely similar fashion. A newspaper reporter named Eric Scott, unknown to Juan Diego, had stopped at this same little grocery. Scott had been covering a fire in the neighborhood, had phoned in his story, then stopped off at Juan Diego's, on impulse, to pick up a six-pack of beer to take home.

Juan Diego was eating his evening meal at the checkout counter when the reporter came in and sniffed the air in appreciation of the tantalizing odor of hot tamales that pervaded the store.

Instinctively Juan Diego held out a plate with half a dozen steaming tamales on it for Scott to take one. The reporter, once he finished eating, licked his fingers to capture the last lingering taste of the tamale.

"Homemade," he said.

Though it was a statement, not a question, Juan Diego nodded. "I make them from a recipe that has come down in my family from my great-great-grandmother. The secret is in adding a kiss of pork to sweeten the beef and grinding the meal just so, to give them the right texture."

"You have them for sale?" the reporter asked.

Again Juan Diego nodded, then led the way to a refrigerator at the back, where big fat tamales, wrapped in real corn shucks, were stacked in neat rows.

"I bought two dozen," Scott testified, "and in the excitement of finding real homemade tamales. I forgot my original reason for stopping. I was halfway home before I remembered the beer. I shrugged and said aloud, 'What the hell, I can buy beer anywhere, anytime, but homemade tamales—'"

Two days later a feature story under Scott's byline appeared in the paper, a nostalgic piece about his childhood, the trips he had made downtown to buy homemade tamales from the old Mexican who sold them from a 10-gallon lard can on the bank corner. It was a story about a bygone America, and he had put his heart, his soul, and his taste buds into it. He ended it with "I bring you tidings of great joy. This day, in a little grocery store in the Mexican section of our fair city, hot tamales—real honest-to-goodness homemade hot tamales swaddled in corn shucks—are being made and sold. Enjoy! Enjoy!"

Legend has it that if you build a better mousetrap, the world will beat a path to your door. This may or may not be true. It is true if you make a better tamale. Juan Diego was living proof of that. The world beat a path to his door.

The very night that Scott's story appeared in the paper a dozen people roused Juan Diego out of his living quarters above the store and pleaded with him to open up and sell them tamales. Each time, though with increasing reluctance, Juan Diego complied.

All the next day Anglos appeared at the grocery, trying to recapture a taste of their past, seeking the hot tamales that they remembered from their youth, hot tamales steaming with flavor—not the paper-wrapped canned variety that they bought infrequently at their neighborhood supermarkets.

Those who were fortunate enough to get some found them to be even better than the tamales of their memories. But most who came were turned away in disappointment, as Juan Diego's small supply was quickly depleted. But he took their orders and promised to fill them as soon as possible: "Sí. Perhaps manana. Who can say?"

At first Juan Diego was happy over the sudden increase in his business. It came at a good time. Family illnesses had caused his bills to mount up. He needed the money. And he and his wife, Consuelo, worked diligently making the tamales with loving care to fill the orders. The finest ingredients were used, the proportions measured precisely, the meal ground to the mystical moment of perfection, the tamales rolled, wrapped in corn shucks, and tied just so before being put in the cooker to steam. After all, it was only a temporary thing surely, he thought. He and Consuelo should make the most of this opportunity while they could. The lost sleep could be made up later—when business was slow or when there was no business.

But business did not slow. It increased. Word of mouth proved once again to be the best form of advertising. People came from all over the city to the store, as to a shrine, and Juan Diego pressed first his daughter Maria, next his son José, and then his married daughters and their families into making tamales to supply the ever-increasing demand.

Fortunately, he had a large supply of shucks on hand, and it was the right time of the year to get more. He sent neighborhood boys out to the farms for miles around to gather corn shucks. And when these proved not to be enough, he wrote to his brothers in the Midwest to ship him more.

Soon people from neighboring towns found their way to Juan Diego's grocery. They could be seen cruising slowly along the street searching for the tiny sign that proclaimed: Juan Diego—Grocery & Meat Market.

The other merchants began to complain. They were jealous of Juan Diego, and their customers were having a difficult time finding places to park.

Juan Diego's regular customers also complained. They resented having to wait for service and being shoved aside by pushy Anglos.

Before long the tail began to wag the dog. The tamales became Juan Diego's main source of income, and after a time, reluctantly, he closed his grocery business and turned the store into a tamale factory.

Then, at the suggestion of one of his customers, a banker named Hunter, he began marketing his tamales through other stores throughout the city. "After all," I told him, "Hunter testified, 'the majority of your customers are Anglos who live in other parts of the city. It would be a convenience or them. If they could buy tamales more easily, they'd buy them more often.'"

Shortly thereafter Hunter made a gift of two dozen of Juan Diego's tamales to the then President of the United States. And two weeks later an order for fifty dozen came from the White House, where they were served at a state dinner.

As a result Juan Diego's tamales were written up in all of the media, but the sight of the President on a TV news report, eating one of Juan Diego's tamales with obvious gusto, was the ultimate advertisement.

The next day a national grocery chain ordered five thousand dozen tamales.

"Juan Diego was overwhelmed," Hunter went on in his testimony. "He wanted to refuse the order, but I persuaded him to take it and secured a warehouse for him on which our bank happened to have a lien. I also suggested that he hire some of the city's hard-core unemployed to help make the tamales, which he did, putting the members of his family to supervising them.

"Of course there was a slight loss of quality in the mass-produced tamales. They weren't made so precisely or with the same loving care as when Juan Diego and Consuelo themselves made them. But to people who had never eaten the originals they seemed like heaven—at least, no one complained."

The five thousand dozen tamales were sold out the same day they were put in the chain stores' refrigerated display cases. The next order was for ten thousand dozen, and then the chain contracted for one-hundred-thousand-dozen lots.

"I was able to find another warehouse for him," Hunter continued, "and the State Employment Agency produced hundreds more employables."

At the behest of the City Council, the mayor proclaimed "Juan Diego Appreciation Day" for his "having hired so many of the city's unemployed, for his having brought honor to the city, and for his et cetera, et cetera, et cetera." But the proclamation made no mention of Juan Diego's ballooning taxes.

Juan Diego and his family began to be recognized in other ways. They were invited out more and more often by members of both the Anglo and Chicano communities: by realtors, car salesmen, furniture store owners; by anyone and everyone who had something to sell. And María began to date an Anglo boy whom she had mooned over in school for years but who never before had appeared to know she existed.

"The business continued to grow dramatically," Hunter replied in response to a question. "Then it peaked, suffered a slight decline, but quickly leveled off, stabilizing on a high plateau of production."

Though at first distrustful of his success—not believing it could happen to someone like him, let alone to him—Juan Diego slowly began to believe in his prosperity and to enjoy it. At the urging of his family and his many new friends he began to spend money—he bought a new home "in a better section of the city," he bought cars, jewelry, clothes, anything and everything his family wanted. All his new friends turned out to be very helpful, aiding him in getting "some really good buys." After all, "the best only seems to cost more—it has a longer life, needs less repairs, stays in style longer."

María had a coming-out party," Scott recalled. "It was attended by most of the prominent business and social leaders of the community. As a climax to the party Juan Diego announced María's engagement. The wedding was set for the following summer. And from all reports it was to be the social event of the season."

Everything was turning up roses. Nothing Juan Diego tri could go wrong.

Then everything did.

"Without Juan Diego knowing it," Scott testified, "union organizers had infiltrated the tamale factories, organizing the workers, persuading them that Juan Diego was a vampire getting fat on their blood, that he owed them more, that they owed him less. Blinded by greed, envy, jealousy, the workers believed it, forgot that they had been jobless when Juan Diego had hired them, that they had been hungry when he had fed them, that he had enabled them to pay the rent, put down payment on a car or TV set. They forgot that they had been on welfare and he had given them dignity and pride.

When the union representatives came to Juan Diego with their demands Juan Diego exploded. "Not on the surface," he testified, "but inside. outwardly I remained calm, polite. The demands were not impossible. If the workers had come to me directly, if one of them had said, 'Juan, you have so much we have so little,' I might have agreed to their requests without argument. But not to their demands made through a third party. My own pride, my own dignity were hurt. So I refused."

The workers went on strike.

"Even then," Juan Diego admitted, "it might not have been too late for a meeting of the minds. But José reminded me that there was a sizable inventory of tamales in the huge walk-in freezers. It would be good to let the workers miss paycheck or two. Let them remember what I had done for them. Besides, Mr. Hunter happened to know where I could get some tamale machines quickly.

"'You don't even have to buy them,' he told me. 'You can rent them for as long as you like. And if you do decide to buy them the rent will apply to the purchase price.'

"'No,' I said. 'I'll rent them, but only for the duration of the strike,' and Mr. Hunter agreed."

The machines were duly installed. The strike floundered, almost collapsed. The machines were doing the workmen's job. The tamales were not so fat as before, the quality not quite so good, but the strike resulted in only a small decline in production and sales.

Juan Diego waited for his friends among the workers to come to talk to him. They in turn waited for him to approach them.

"Some of the strikers grew angry and impatient," Scott testified. "A fire broke out at one of the factories, three of Juan Diego's refrigerated trucks were run off the road and overturned, a bomb explosion shattered the windows and one wall of his new home, José was waylaid and beaten. There were bitter words, recriminations, open threats."

Juan Diego's heart hardened, his resistance stiffened.

"The supply of corn shucks began to dwindle," Hunter testified, "and I persuaded Juan to substitute paper. 'After all,' I told him, 'shucks don't work as well in the machines—they require too much preparation; and they're much too expensive. Besides, it's the meat and meal, not the shucks, that give the flavor.'"

"I knew that was not completely true," Juan Diego conceded. "The steam penetrates the shucks more easily than it does paper. Still the question was—how do you say?—academic. No shucks were available.

"The paper wrapping caused another slight loss of quality, another small loss in sales; but it speeded up production, increased inventories."

The sabotage continued.

"I had to hire guards to protect my factories, my drivers, my family. Once there was an exchange of gunfire. One of the strikers was killed, one of the guards wounded.

"Mr. Hunter suggested setting up factories in other parts of the country, closer to the chief markets—shutting down locally until things cooled off.

"If you think it best," I said.

"The thing to do is to incorporate," Mr. Hunter said, "and build new plants from scratch, factories specially designed to produce nothing but tamales."

"I shook my head. 'Where could I get so much money?' I asked.

"Leave it to me," he answered. "We'll get it from the government. Show the government boys that you can give jobs to thousands of hard-core unemployed, and they'll gladly lend you the money, and at a low rate of interest."

Sites were selected, factories were designed, machinery was purchased, loans were floated. Overnight Juan Diego became a multimillion-dollar corporation, a financial power.

"When I suggested putting the tamales in cans, the better to store and protect them, since his inventories were getting out of hand," Hunter went on, "Juan hardly protested. Of course he had been renting the freezer space for storage, and the cost had been prohibitive. That may have helped to reconcile him to the decision."

The truth was that the heart had gone out of Juan Diego. Perhaps as a result of "the hatred I saw in the eyes of pickets who had been, not just my workers, but my friends; they stood silently as I drove through the picket lines in my big limousine, and I could feel their hatred like a cold lump in my stomach."

Scott's testimony was often interpretative. "Because of the strike," he explained, "Maria's wedding was quietly postponed—perhaps for fear of what some of the more fanatical strikers might do at the sight of so much pomp and luxury. By then most of them were back on relief—their cars and washing machines and TV sets repossessed for failure to make payments.

"At about the same time the bottom dropped out of everything. When the canned tamales hit the market they sold almost as well as they had in frozen form and in bulk. But people bought them only once, discovering that somewhere along the line the product had changed. The ingredients had lost some of their quality, some of their unique flavor. Even the texture was no longer the same. Now they were not any better than the other canned brands on the market. And when the housewives of America went back to the supermarkets to buy tamales, they also went back to their old brands."

Scott hesitated, then looked away from Juan Diego before he continued: "I don't know when Juan Diego learned that his son had sold him out along with the rest. At first Juan had mixed the ingredients for the hot tamales in secret. Then, when the business expanded, he had José help him. Finally, in the press of setting up the new factories, he turned the complete responsibility for mixing the ingredients over to his son.

"José didn't see the need to buy expensive cuts of meat. He didn't see the need to add pork or grind the meal as fine. So he substituted inferior meat and meal, then had the suppliers bill his father as before, with José pocketing the kickbacks."

Much of Hunter's testimony had to be pried from him by persistent questioning. Only when the answers reflected credit to him did he speak freely. "The factories continued under construction. The machines that Juan Diego had ordered piled up in warehouses. The inventories grew and grew until there was no more space to store them. Then everything ground to a halt. Reluctantly I advised bankruptcy."

Scott talked as if he were writing a news story. "When it was over and done," he reported, "Juan Diego lay buried under his paper empire. All that he possessed in his own name was his original little grocery store, which out of sentiment he had never sold and which still remained in the records as his home, instead of the half-million-dollar estate in the exclusive country-club district to which he had moved his family at the height of his success."

Juan Diego's own testimony was painfully honest. "Without ever quite knowing how or why it had happened," he said, "I found myself back in the grocery business—at the same old stand, as they say, but not as before. Too many things had changed. My friends, both old and new, had turned against me. I was a laughing-stock throughout the city. My son had disappeared with the funds he had skimmed from the dregs of my failure. But the wound that ached most of all was the one caused by the death of my daughter.

"The collapse of my business brought the collapse of her hopes for marriage. Her young man broke their engagement and María's heart. And almost immediately he married another girl.

"The day her young man married I found her 'sleeping' and could not wake her.

"After that I went through the motions of running the grocery store. And in time the pain lost a little of its bitter sting. People began to forget. Old customers returned, drifting back gradually in ones and twos. After all, my grocery was convenient and my prices were right.

"Then one day Consuelo suggested that we make some tamales. Not to sell, you understand, but just for ourselves. I shrugged and said, 'Si. Why not?'

"Late in the afternoon, several days later, a young man entered the grocery and bought a pack of cigarettes. I had never seen him before.

"I was eating my supper at the checkout counter as usual at that time of day and the young man sniffed the air appreciatively.

"'Hot tamales!' he said. 'Homemade hot tamales!'

"Instinctively I held out the plate with the tamales on it and he took one, wolfed it down, and licked his fingers. Then the thought evidently hit him.

"'You know what?' he said. 'A fellow could make a mint of money with tamales like these. I bet they'd be almost as good if we mass-produced them. The main thing is to get them before the public—let them know what we've got to sell.

"'I've got a friend, a newspaperman. I'll get him to write a story saying, 'There's this little Chicano down in Mexican Town who makes the best damned tamales ev—''

"Something went click in my mind. I knew what I was doing—but couldn't stop myself. It was as if I was standing off watching myself from one side, as if my hand acted independent of my brain. I saw it reach out, take the revolver from under the counter, and begin shooting.

"I'd be pulling the trigger still if someone hadn't taken the gun from me."

As he spoke, I felt my finger tighten, and I knew I could cast my ballot only one way.

EDITORIAL QUESTION: If you were a member of the jury, what would your vote be? Guilty? Juan Diego committed murder—that is admitted. But was he really guilty?

continuing the NEW series of police procedurals by

LAWRENCE TREAT

Lieutenant Decker, Chief of Homicide, was out of town when this big case broke. Commissioner Sturm himself took charge, and the way he played it the case turned into a lulu—as if it wasn't a lulu to begin with! And the way Inspector Mitch Taylor played it, cool and easy, it stayed a lulu. A policeman's lot and all that . . . oh, yeah?

AS IN KIDNAPING

by LAWRENCE TREAT

It seemed that somebody had finally caught on that Lieutenant Bill Decker, Chief of Homicide, knew his stuff. So the French government, or maybe it was the Mayor of Paris, invited the Lieutenant over to Europe so he could give the French the lowdown on how to stop crime. Naturally, this thing back here broke while the Lieutenant wasn't around. And right in the Thanksgiving weekend, besides.

Inspector Mitch Taylor heard about it on his way to work, from this bus driver. Mitch didn't know the guy's name, except Mitch rode his bus pretty often and knew that face. A real sourpuss it was, too.

The driver knew Mitch all right on account Mitch had to show his identification to get a free ride. Usually this sourpuss had something personal to yak about, like he had a sore back or some mechanic hadn't greased the steering arm right or else he was behind schedule after some bohunk had side-swiped him or something.

This morning he looked up at Mitch like he'd never seen him before and he waited for Mitch to take his identification out of his pocket, instead of saying okay like the rest of the drivers did. Then this sourpuss raced his motor for a few seconds, just in case there happened to be some clean air around. After he was pretty sure he'd done his bit for pollution he closed the door and started up. After that he spoke to Mitch.

© 1971 by Lawrence Treat.

"You heard about it?" he said.

"Heard what?"

"I thought maybe they would have told you. Besides, it was all over the radio."

"No kidding," Mitch said, without any real interest. He figured that if sourpuss was so anxious to tell him something it was bad news and it could wait. So he said, "No kidding." And he looked away. After that somebody dropped a dime on the floor, and what with everybody getting all excited looking for it and jamming up the entrance, the bus couldn't start again until the door was clear.

Next the driver had to make change, and then there was this small foreign car the bus driver wanted to cut off, on account maybe he didn't like foreign cars or else he was just show-boating. Anyhow, Mitch had pretty much forgotten that the driver had this world-shaking news, and Mitch was thinking of the way Amy had looked when she'd said goodbye to him this morning. He was kind of far-off when this sourpuss brought him back.

"You ain't heard?" the driver said.

"Heard what?" Mitch said.

"They kidnaped the Governor's eight-year-old kid and they're going to kill him unless the Governor lets some convicts go."

"You serious?" Mitch said.

"It's like those political kidnappings. They got them a hostage, and I guess they mean business. Nobody told you?"

"Where'd this happen?" Mitch asked.

"Right here in town. Chances are you'll be working on the case, huh?"

"If they wanted me on it," Mitch said, "they'd have called me. A thing like this, they'll probably do what they're told to, until the kid's safe. After that maybe we'll get into the act."

"Guys that take an eight-year-old kid and want to kill him, they ought to get strung up. Except hanging's too good for them. They ought to suffer, see?"

After that the bus began to crowd up and Mitch didn't get much of a chance to talk to the driver. But at headquarters that was all you heard, and Mitch finally got the real facts.

It seemed that Governor Paraman was in town to make a Thanksgiving speech at the Center Hotel, and while him d the Mrs. were at the nquet where he was sounding f, somebody had walked into eir suite and asked Paulie did want to go downstairs and ten to his old man. Anyhow, at's what the kid told the avator operator on the way own. He'd gotten off at the ezzanine, and from there it ust have been a cinch to ndle him out of the hotel and it him in the car. Around idnight the Governor had otten this call telling him to ok at the note in the kid's om.

That was the first anybody ew about it. Paulie's nurse ho slept in the same room ith him was snoring away and ey had trouble waking her. It emed she was drugged. Maybe ith a couple of plain ordinary eeping pills which she could ave taken on purpose, if she as working with the gang. therwise, they'd been slipped to the glass of ginger ale that e'd ordered around ten o'clock that evening, like she did ost nights.

The note told the Governor d better pardon a couple of onvicts named Skelly and amon. They were bank robbers and they were in for 99 ears apiece, for a holdup in hich they'd killed a guard and olen a bank truck with a half illion dollars in it, cash. The dough had never been found.

The Homicide Squad had worked on the case and Mitch, like the rest of the gang, was pretty sure that somebody must have promised to get the pair of convicts out if they split the dough. Whoever it was they'd snatched Paulie Paraman and were holding him hostage until the Governor issued a pardon. The trouble was that if you backed them up against the wall they were liable to kill this kid just so he couldn't identify them. So the Governor and Commissioner Sturm were holding off a police hunt until the kid was safe. The orders, straight from the Governor, were for the Homicide Squad to stay out of this.

With that much settled, Mitch and Ed Balenky went across the street for a cup of coffee. Naturally they got to talking about the case.

"There's a question of law here," Balenky said. He'd read a book last year and he should have been a lawyer, the way he was always getting down to what was legal and what wasn't. "If they get a pardon it's under duress, so is it any good?"

"They'll be out of the country before anything like that comes up. Maybe Cuba."

"What would Cuba want them for?" Balenky said. "In Cuba they cotton up to political refugees, but what would they want with a couple of hoods?"

"Anybody can use some first-rate bank robbers," Mitch said. "And these two, they're good. Remember the trouble we had hauling them in?"

"Five hundred grand," Balenky said. He took out his morning cigar, studied it, then stuck it in his mouth. He'd chew on it for a while before he lit up. After that you couldn't get near him, on account of the cheap cigars he smoked. Like Mitch had said once, tear gas is okay most of the time, but when it doesn't work they ought to send for Ed Balenky and his stogie.

Mitch watched the way Balenky admired the thing before biting into it. "Five hundred grand," Balenky said again. "What'll happen is, they'll hold this kid until Skelly and Damon pick up their dough and get out of the country. Then we'll find out where Paulie is, if he's still around."

"And after that," Mitch said, "we'll get the case. When all the leads are stale. When the kid's dead, maybe. I got a feeling they'll be scared to let him go."

"If the boss was around," Balenky said, "he'd start things rolling without anybody getting wised up. But this way, Jub up there in the lab hasn't even seen the note. He ought to be analyzing it, checking out the paper and stuff like that."

"That can wait," Mitch said. "The way this ought to be handled is, we ought to get a list of visitors that have seen these two guys up in the pen, because that's where the deal was made. You find out who saw them, and then you back-track."

"You'll probably find out nobody saw them except their wives. Then you'll have to go to work on the wives."

"Damon has no wife," Mitch said. "We traced him through that girl friend of his. Jane Olney. Remember?"

"Yeah. I wonder where she is now." Balenky took the cigar out of his mouth and looked at it like he thought maybe he ought to light up. Which made it time for Mitch to go.

"Well," he said, "I ought to get started."

"You got something to do?" Balenky asked, like he didn't damn well know that Mitch, same as himself and the rest of the squad, was going out after Paulie.

"Just a summons to serve, over in the Second," Mitch said, without moving. He figured he'd stick around until Balenky took out a match. Only before he did, a uniformed cop came into the joint and spotted them.

"You guys," he said. "They want you over in the squad room. Orders from the Big Cheese himself."

The Big Cheese was Commissioner Sturm, and so it looked like maybe something was up. And the gang thought so, too. It seemed that while Mitch and Balenky were having that cup of coffee, the Governor and the Mayor and the commissioner had brought all the brass together in the lineup room, which was the biggest room there was, to give a couple of pep talks. They were mostly for the benefit of the press, though, and about all that the three of them had managed to get across was that Paulie's life took top priority (they'd all used the same word, priority), and that everybody would do his best in these trying hours. The only thing they left out was what they were going to do, and the gang were on the Homicide Squad and the feeling that whatever it was, they were elected.

It turned out even worse than that, though. Sturm came in and buttered everybody up and gave them the same baloney he'd shoveled out to the press. He handed out some pictures of Paulie Paraman, so you'd know him in case he happened to come walking down the street.

After that the Commissioner came up with a lulu. He said that in respect for the Governor's wishes they had to lay off the kidnapers, so the only way left to tackle this problem was to find the money. Once the $500,000 was located, there'd be no reason for releasing the robbers, and the kidnapers would have to let Paulie go. And since the boys on the Homicide Squad had worked on the original robbery, they were best equipped to find the dough.

Nobody said much. Two years ago they'd gone all out trying to locate that dough, and they'd struck out. Now they were supposed to go and dig it up before supper. And maybe the Commissioner really thought it was possible, or maybe he was just shooting off his mouth. Anyhow he ended up by saying the Homicide Squad was the pick of the department, they knew their business, so he wasn't going to tell them what to do.

Once he was out of their hair, the squad got busy dopping out their program for the day. First off, they all of them knew they couldn't dream up that dough and they had no leads. Second, they knew they'd better get the hell out of here and make like they were onto something, and don't get caught hanging around any bars or lunch counters, either. And finally, forget the Commissioner's orders, just go out and try and locate Paulie; only remember one thing—his safety comes first.

This summons that Mitch had to serve, he kept it in his pocket, just in case. But what he really did was to check up on the places where the Olney dame used to hang out.

First, there was this beauty parlor. There, they told him she hadn't been around in the last couple of weeks, which was unusual. Next, he tried the garage where she'd kept her car. She still did and it was there all right and Mitch took down the license number, but she hadn't had the car out for the last few days.

After that he tried a couple of bars where she used to hang out, but he drew blanks. Then he remembered how she went big for Italian food and was a sucker for panatoni. According to Amy there were only two or three places where it was any good, and they were on Dante Street. But down there all Mitch found out was that she hadn't been around for a while.

In Mitch's mind it began to add up. She'd quit her routine because she was setting up something big, like the Paulie kidnaping. So where do you go now?

You don't know. You just stick around wherever you happen to be. You keep your eyes open and take it easy. At that was when Mitch saw the green panel truck with the markings.

Mostly, trucks like that are hired, only the license plate. This one wasn't a rental number. The number was 483-386. Maybe that was why Mitch had the hunch, so he waited around like this was the big break he'd be counting on. And then a girl came out of the store with a bag of groceries and got in the truck. And Mitch knew what it was.

A man, by the name Hager. He was the school supervisor on Lanier, and about a year ago he'd been a witness in some minor robbery in the school. Exactly why he was driving a panel truck Mitch didn't know. But school was closed for the holiday and Hager had probably gone out to buy the groceries for his family.

In a panel truck? This Mitch had to look into, so when Hager started off, Mitch followed.

He was pretty sure Hager hadn't spotted him. There are times when you don't want anybody to know you're tailing him, and Mitch was good at that. But then there are other times when you maybe want to flush somebody out and see what happens, and this was one of them. So Mitch lit off after the truck and pretty soon it slowed up on purpose to let him pass. Which meant the guy had noticed he was being followed. And you don't notice things like that unless you're doing something you shouldn't.

With no chance to find out where Hager was bound for, Mitch remembered that lookout spot on top of Sunset Heights. He kept going, took the winding road up the hill, stopped alongside the lookout, and stepped out. It was quite a view, and by a stroke of luck he spotted the green truck down on Lanier and going west toward the school. Which was empty, what with this being vacation time. There the truck turned into the parking lot where Mitch couldn't see it any more.

What he had now was, this super driving a panel truck and going over to his school. Which, the way Mitch figured it, had nothing to do with the kidnapping. It meant that this Hager was probably stealing school supplies and athletic equipment and stuff like that. He needed the truck for transportation, and it would take him a while to load up.

On account Mitch was supposed to be locating that pile of moolah, he couldn't admit he was chasing after some fly-weight crook making off with a few bucks' worth of city property. Consequently Mitch didn't report back where he was and that he was leaving his car. In fact, knowing he might get into trouble for just that, he almost changed his mind and gave the whole thing up. Then he told himself he'd have a look-see and let it go at that. In a week or two when the theft was reported he'd know all about it. And the way he'd use what he knew, it was going to make him look good.

With that decided, he drove into the parking lot. The truck was there along with a black Rambler, license-plate number 12FX48. He jotted down the number on his pad and then went up to the side door of the school, the one off the parking lot, and gave it a try. It was open, so he went in. He felt kind of funny at first, it made him think back to when he'd been a kid. And he'd been no genius, either. Maybe once a month, he got sent up to the principal's office and right now he had that feeling again, wanting out. Somehow, schools weren't for him. Never were and never would be.

He went downstairs anyhow, where there was a long hallway with lockers on both sides. They were tall lockers and he opened one of them, just for instance. It was empty, but with the click of the door he heard another locker open and this kid came running down the hall and trying to scoot past him, and nobody had to tell Mitch that the kid was Paulie.

Mitch made a grab and caught him and the kid said, "How did you find me?" And from the kid's look and from the way he had been trying to get past him, Mitch caught on that the kid had been playing hide-and-seek and thought Mitch was part of the game. But what hit Mitch was the kid's expression, sad-eyed and sort of appealing, like he'd been hurt inside and nobody'd ever loved him and so he was a sucker for anybody who did more than give him the time of day.

"Your dad and your mom sent me," Mitch said, taking the kid by the hand. "Come on."

Paulie sort of pulled back. "But I don't want to go," he said. "I got a new Mommy and Daddy and they're going to take me to the moon."

"Yeah?" Mitch said. "You going by rocket, or what?"

"I don't know how we're going, but I heard them say they're taking me to the moon."

"They were just kidding," Mitch said. "Look—I'm a cop and we can go chase robbers. Like to do that?"

"You're a real policeman?" Paulie said.

"You bet I am," Mitch answered. Which was the wrong thing to say, on account this guy with the low nasal voice spoke up from behind Mitch. "Okay, wise guy. Put your hands up, and don't turn around."

Mitch, feeling like he'd been caught off first, had sense enough to do what he was told. The kid's eyes got big, and he made a kind of oohing sound as he backed off.

The voice went on, "Beat it, kid. Go on back to Jane."

The kid moved off, out of Mitch's line of vision, and then footsteps plunked along the floor and got closer to Mitch. They stopped when something poked into his back, and a kind of stale breath hit him and made him want to jerk free.

"I got a gun on you," the voice said. "Try any little thing and you'll get it. I got itchy fingers, so be nice and quiet while I get that rod of yours."

"Take it," Mitch said. "I don't know who you are and I don't want to know. So take it and then tell me where you're leaving it, so I can pick it up later on. Okay?"

There was no answer. Mitch kept his head stiff and motionless, but his eyes strained to look down at the hand pulling his gun out of the holster. The fingers were stubby, the nails short and bitten down. The skin was yellow, like it was stained by nicotine. That was Mitch's last observation before something smashed down on his head and he went out cold.

When he came to, he was in a dark place somewhere and he was slouched on the floor. The smell of spices was strong, but at first he was too groggy to put things together. After a while, though, he began to chase the cobwebs out of his brain and he figured he was in a closet of some kind where they stored food. Which didn't explain the ticking.

It came from outside, and he stood up and felt for the doorknob and then turned it. When it didn't open the door he realized he was locked in. Which made the ticking sound real nasty, because they don't have tick-tock clocks in school. They have quiet electric ones.

So—a bomb? He didn't know, but the idea that maybe it was did a lot of things to him. It started up the adrenalin or something, and his mind began working pretty good and he checked stuff off. His holster was empty and his regular flashlight was gone, but the little one that clipped on like a pen was still in his inside pocket. He took the thing out and snapped it on, and he saw the spice jars and all the cans on the shelves. Then the beam reflected something metallic on the floor, and he bent down and spotted the screwdriver that somebody must have dropped. With that in his hand it was just a matter of wedging around where the lock was, and keeping at it. It took him five minutes to get free—five minutes of sweating it out, while he listened to the tick-tick.

When he stepped out he found himself in the pantry off the school kitchen. There was a suitcase in front of the closet and that was where the ticking came from. He was pretty sure, then, it was a bomb, and he went out quick, on account he knew nothing about bombs and wasn't going to start learning now.

Nobody had to tell him, either, what the kidnapers were up to. They'd been keeping Paulie here in the kitchen, which was where Hager had been headed with that food. He'd probably bought Jane Olney's favorite stuff. And while the school was a pretty good hideout for a couple of days or so, the kidnapers had to get out before Monday's classes.

They must have had the bomb ready, and Mitch admitted it was a pretty smart idea. Because, what with all the school violence going around, nobody was going to connect the explosion with the Paulie kidnaping. So the thing would go off and gum up any evidence that Paulie had been here or that Hager had any part in holding him. And besides, it would take care of Mitch. Because, while the investigation would show he'd been here, the theory would be that he'd been on the trail of the school bomber.

All that was clear enough to Mitch as he put distance between himself and the kitchen. He went along a corridor that made a turn, and there in front of him were the lockers and the place where he'd first run into Paulie. He kept going until he found the lavatory. After dousing himself with cold water he felt a little better, and his mug in the mirror looked like it always did—just an ordinary face, with dark eyes and stiff wiry hair. When he ran his hand through it he could feel a bump all right. but there was no blood. Which meant he wouldn't have a bunch of awkward questions to answer. He had a little time now to get his bearings and decide what to do next. Because the one thing he wasn't going to do was, he wasn't going to report in at headquarters.

There were a lot of reasons for that. First off, any cop who located Paulie and then got knocked cold and lost Paulie wasn't going to get any medals pinned on him. A guy like Commissioner Sturm, he'd have your gun and your badge for this. And talking about guns, what about Mitch's? It looked like he was going to be in for a lot of tall explaining.

Next, along with the rest of the Homicide Squad, Mitch was under orders to lay off the kidnapers and concentrate on locating the dough. If he'd walked into headquarters with Paulie in tow, that would have been okay. But to admit he'd been after somebody on a minor larceny charge and had run into the kidnapers by mistake, with the result that now they were warned off—that was out. Definitely. If Mitch knew what was good for him.

It would have been different if the Lieutenant had been around. With him here, Mitch would have come out straight with what had happened. Not exactly straight, maybe, but he'd have told the important part, angling it a little here and there so's to take care of the business of his losing his gun. After that the Lieutenant would have the responsibility of handling the information. But on the dough they paid Mitch he wasn't going to make any high-level decisions. So where was he?

The answer to that was easy. He was the guy with the red-hot dope, and it was up to him to hand it in to headquarters as soon as he could. Which meant a phone call. And while there was a chance that the bomb might go off any minute, there ought to be a phone around here somewhere that wasn't too near the kitchen.

The best place to find a phone was in the principal's office, which ought to be near the main entrance. Leastways it always had been when Mitch was in school, and he was glad to find out that much, at least, hadn't changed.

He made his call to the dispatcher, and in a disguised voice, too. What Mitch said was, 'A man and a woman are driving a green panel truck, plate number 483-386. They got Paulie with them. And you better look out for a black Rambler, plate number 12FX48.' He hung up fast. While his information might not be strictly accurate all the way, it gave the main facts.

Out in the parking lot the Rambler and the panel truck were gone, of course. His own car was there, though, locked up like it was supposed to be. And that might have been something to cheer about, except when he stuck his hand in his pocket, where was the key, huh?

Still, he'd opened plenty of locked cars and was more or less an expert at it. All you had to do was force open the front part of the window, reach in, and unlock the door. After that you located the ignition wires and twisted them together, and you were off.

Mitch was maybe a couple of blocks from the school when he heard the explosion. It sounded like a pretty big one, but he had other worries, namely, what was he going to do about that gun of his? On account when you lose your gun, you got to come up with some pretty good explanations if you don't want to be strung up on the meat hook. So—shut up about it and go around without a gun? Or admit he'd lost his? And if so, what kind of a story could he cook up?

After about fifteen or twenty minutes it looked like his mind was frozen up for the day, so he just stopped thinking about it. Right after that he spotted the toy store.

He parked in front of it, went in, and saw all the imitation automatic rifles and revolvers and mini-size cannons and bazookas and stuff like that, and he thought of the holdups that had been staged with toy guns. So why wouldn't the trick work for him?

"I got a kid," he said to the clerk, "that wants a gun like a cop's. You know how kids are. So let's see what you got in the way of toy revolvers."

He was lucky and found an imitation .38 Police Positive. He let the clerk wrap it up and then he went back to his car and took the gun out of the package and stuck it in his holster. He felt a little silly going around with a toy gun, but at least he was covered for a while, until he dreamed up something that would really get him off the hook.

He was back in the police garage a little before 3:00 and got hold of Artie. Artie was this mechanic Mitch had done a bunch of favors for over the years, and Artie had done a few for him. So all he had to do was tell Artie to fix up the window and get him a new key, and shut up about it.

Mitch hung around the garage while Artie went to work. They had a radio going here, some kind of rock music, but Mitch didn't particularly listen until they cut off the music to make an announcement.

"We interrupt this program," the announcer said, "to give you the following special bulletin: A green panel truck believed to be the one in which Paulie Paraman was abducted was apprehended by the police after a short chase. The four occupants were heavily armed. One of them has been identified as John Hager, superintendent of Davis High School, where a bomb was exploded earlier today, and the other as William Spring. It is not known if there is any connection between the bombing and the abduction, and thus there is no trace of Paulie. K turned to this station for further news."

After that the rock station started up again. Mitch walked over to Artie, who was almost finished with the job.

"Well," Mitch said, "what do you know, huh?"

Artie shook his head. "I hope they didn't do anything to the kid."

"Yeah," Mitch said.

He figured maybe it was time to show up in the square room. Because, the way Mitch saw it, with Hager and the other guy caught, and the other guy was probably the one that conked Mitch, it looked like Jane Olney had gone somewheres with the kid. If she had and if she was the only one of the gang still loose, she ought to know she couldn't carry out a scheme through all by herself

On the other hand what if they'd already killed the kid? Or if there were some more members of the gang and they were getting desperate? Or if Jane had the kid with her and didn't know what had happened or what to do and so she panicked. Then what?

Mitch couldn't remember when he'd been so jittery. But the more he thought things over, the more he told himself he'd get nowhere and help nobody by going up to the Commissioner and spouting out his information. Besides, with the boss away, Sturm was short-circuiting the Homicide Squad and trying to cop all the credit for himself. And right now he was interrogating Hager and this other guy, William Spring.

About the only guy Mitch could trust for advice was Jub Freeman, up in the lab. Jub, who was about as close to Mitch as anybody around, had the job of working up the technical end of stuff, like ballistics and fingerprints and moulage casts of anything that looked like it might get to be evidence.

When Mitch went up to the lab, Jub was working and he just turned his head around for a couple of seconds to see who it was.

"Hi," Mitch said. "I don't want to get in your way, but I thought maybe I could help a little."

Jub, peering through a microscope, said, "You?" Then he gave a kind of chuckle. "No, thanks," he said. "Got to do this myself. Going to take me all night, too. So much stuff here—"

His voice trailed off. Mitch, frowning, told himself this wasn't exactly the time to bother Jub with outside problems. Still, Mitch hung around for a couple of minutes to make his visit look casual and kind of wandered over to the counter where the stuff from the panel truck had been placed, all properly tagged. He noticed the bag of groceries that Hager had picked up on Dante Street earlier in the day. Next to it were the weapons—a small .22, maybe the Olney dame's, and a big .45, and a .38. The .38 was Mitch's.

He took the toy gun out of his holster, put it down on the counter, and picked up his own gun. Then he quickly switched the identifying tag over to the toy gun and lowered it to the counter. Jub hadn't even turned around.

"Quite a haul," Mitch commented. His voice grated, and he had to clear his throat. "What about the truck?" he asked, trying to stay casual.

"Stolen." Jub still didn't turn around. "What did you expect? The owner didn't even know it was gone."

"Yeah," Mitch said, beginning to feel relaxed. "You'd think a guy would know when his own truck was missing."

"He had it stored in a garage for the winter. He only uses the truck summers, for his country place. Up at Moon Lodge."

Mitch crossed the room. "Where?" he said. "Where's Moon Lodge?"

"Upstate somewhere. Why?"

"Nothing," Mitch said. "Nothing at all. Except—"

Jub swung around. "Something wrong, Mitch?"

Mitch shook his head. "Been a hell of a day," he said. "Well, I'll be seeing you."

He took the stairs down and stopped on the halfway landing. He wasn't exactly shaky, but he just felt he'd better hold up there for a couple of seconds and think things through.

He was off the hook on the gun. There might be a few questions asked about that toy gun and Jub might guess Mitch had made the switch, but it would be no skin off Jub's nose. And he'd keep his suspicions to himself. But what really shook Mitch up was knowing where Paulie was. The kid had said they were taking him to the moon. Sure—Moon Lodge. It all checked. Hager and Spring had somehow found out about Moon Lodge and how nobody was there in winter and how even the truck could be picked up. So the thing was, Mitch had to hand his news without letting on where he was.

It had worked before and would work again, so Mitch went across the street to where he could use the pay phone. He stepped into the place. Balenky called over from the table.

"Hey, Mitch, how about having one with me?" And he pointed to the mug of beer in front of him.

Mitch nodded. "Sure," he said. "Be right with you. Only got to call the wife first and then I'll be a little late."

He stuck his dime in the slot, got the despatcher and spoke the same disguised voice he used before. "You know what this is," he said. "Paulie's at the Moon Lodge place, upstate. With Jane Olney. She probably took him there in the black Rambler, so get moving." Then he stepped out of the booth and went over to sit down and wait it out with Ed Balenky.

They hashed over the case pretty much the way they had done this morning, and Balenky had plenty of ideas, most which were cockeyed. Mitch just listened and didn't say much, on account when you start talking to Ed he's liable to catch on to what you don't want him to.

Mitch was on his second beer and still listening when Jim Bankhart came in, a broad grin spread all over his face.

"Heard the news?" he said. "They found Paulie. State police got a tip and they went to some place upstate. Moon Lodge, they called it. It was empty except for the Olney dame and the kid. She was waiting there for Hager and Spring, only instead of them the police showed up."

"Funny business," Balenky said. "That's the second tipoff came in. Sounds too pat. It's a cover-up for something. If you ask me, I don't believe there were any phone calls. Sounds as if Sturm's pulling a fast one."

Mitch made like he was giving the matter deep thought before he came up with a comment. And even then he sort of hedged.

"Yeah," he said. "Maybe you got something there."

INDEX TO VOLUME FIFTY-EIGHT—JULY-DECEMBER 1971

(Continued from page 160)

RIEN, JOHN: Ludwig Soaring Down	July	103	SELZER, RICHARD A.: The Dark Place	Dec.	83
REIL, DENNIS: Report on a Broken Bridge	Dec.	46	SHERMAN, S.: Yellow Fever ..	Sept.	119
RIETER, JOSH: Sam Buried Caesar	Aug.	57	STENZEL, R. D.: The Case of the Untraceable Guns	Dec.	112
RY, HENRY T.: Turnpike Roulette	Aug.	111	STEVENS, R. L.: The Physician and the Opium Fiend	July	131
RICE, J. F.: The Hot Tamales Murder Case	Dec.	123	THIRTEEN	Dec.	60
TECOST, HUGH: Pierre Chambrun and the Last Fling	Sept.	54	STOUT, REX: Counterfeit for Murder	Aug.	22
TRICHO and the Dead Clue	Dec.	6	SWEET, JEFF: Nightmare in New York	Aug.	84
RICE, JOHN: Exercise Number One	Sept.	133	SYMONS, JULIAN: Experiment in Personality	July	33
THE Ropewalker	Oct.	95	Preserving the Evidence	Nov.	45
VELL, JAMES: Three Men in a Tub	Sept.	110	TREAT, LAWRENCE: The Mushroom Fanciers	July	20
WEN, ELLERY: Death of a Pawnbroker	Nov.	113	R As in Rookie	Oct.	23
WYSON, C.: The World's Smallest Locked Room	Aug.	120	K As in Kidnaping	Dec.	133
RIETER, JOAN: The Prisoner of Zemu Island	Oct.	46	TYRE, NEDRA: An Act of Deliverance	Aug.	77
WYBERS, J. T.: The Murderer	Nov.	27	WELLEN, EDWARD: Murder Will Out	Aug.	119
			YOUNG, ALAN K.: Ponsonby and the Classic Cipher	Dec.	67

FROM A LAWYER'S ARCHIVES

a NEW legal-detective story by

MICHAEL GILBERT

first magazine publication in the United States

Here is the second in Michael Gilbert's new series of legal-detective stories — another strange and fascinating mystery hidden this time in a deed wallet in the files of Messrs. Preece and Sexton, lawyers for a certain Colonel Ambrose Spender who had once distinguished himself for daring Intelligence work . . . What deep dark secrets are buried in the archives of an established law firm? . . .

ACCESSORIES AFTER THE FACT

by MICHAEL GILBERT

M alcolm Preece settled himself in the far corner seat of the last first-class carriage on the 7:50 train from Woking to London. The seat was one in which long usage had given him almost prescriptive rights. After blowing his nose and wishing his regular traveling companion, Mr. Satterthwaite, good morning, he turned to the obituary columns of The Times.

A familiar name caught his eye.

"I see that one of our local celebrities has gone," he said.

"Not Miss Pringle?" said Mr. Satterthwaite. "Dear, dear, and we all thought she'd make her century."

"No. Not Miss Pringle. Colonel Spender."

"I heard he'd been ill. He was a tough old boy. We thought he might have got over it."

"Not this time," said Mr. Preece and handed his copy of the paper to Mr. Satterthwaite, across a small woman who had resumed to occupy the seat between them. Mr. Preece suspected that she didn't have a first-class ticket.

© 1970 by Michael Gilbert.

"Spender, Ambrose. After a painful illness gallantly borne. died in Guildford Infirmary. no flowers. Donations to the Imperial War Graves Commission."

"An eccentric character, by all accounts," said Mr. Satterthwaite.

"He was one of my clients," said Mr. Preece, with a note of proof.

"Then I withdraw the remark. If he was a client of the firm of Preece and Sexton he must have been a man of the highest repute."

"He had had a rather odd career," conceded Mr. Preece. He called himself Colonel Spender. I had been told, in strict confidence" — and here Mr. Preece glared at the small woman as if daring her to repeat something overheard, in confidence, in a first-class railway carriage — "that he was awarded this rank, and a number of English and foreign decorations, too, for daring intelligence work behind the enemy lines."

"I only knew him vaguely," said Mr. Satterthwaite. "He had one of those houses in Knäp-"

Woods, didn't he? Rather nice houses, but a bit isolated."

"Not exactly isolated. A bit remote."

"Wasn't that where they found that woman — what was her name?"

"Mrs. Slaney."

"Mrs. Slaney. That's right. She'd been knocked on the head. But not robbed or — er — assaulted. The police never solved it."

"It was a complete mystery," said Mr. Preece, "and it looks as if it will stay that way. It's nearly two years since it happened. The trail must be very cold by now."

The small woman, who was tired of being ignored, said defiantly, "My aunt's cook, who was walking out with one of the policemen, told her that the case was not closed. They had a clue. And he told her what it was — in confidence, of course."

"Oh?" said Mr. Preece.

"Really?" said Mr. Satterthwaite.

Both gentlemen then retired behind their newspapers and did not utter another word until the train reached Waterloo Station.

If a certain disparity in temperament produces the happiest marriages, the same might be said of professional partnerships. Certainly the legal practice of Messrs. Preece and Sexton, though not long established in Bedford Row, managed to get along well enough, although it would have been hard to find two men of more widely different characters than Mr. Preece and Mr. Sexton.

Malcolm Preece was correct in dress and deportment, conservative in outlook, and extremely conscientious in his work. He was normally the first to arrive at the office, and often the last to leave. David Sexton was casual, empirical, and occasionally, in Mr. Preece's view, unnecessarily flippant. However, it was a combination of talents which seemed to work. As Mr. Preece sometimes remarked to his clients, "If there's a theoretical solution, I can usually work it out. If I'm stuck, David Sexton can often find a practical answer."

While they were opening and sorting out the mail, a ritual which they carried out together every morning, Mr. Preece told him of the death of Colonel Spender.

"Yes," said Sexton, "I saw it in The Times. I thought I'd get his will up so that we could have a look at it. I believe you're his sole executor, aren't you?"

"I think I am," said Mr. Preece.

He was untwisting the string which held down the flap of the deed wallet. The first thing which slid out as he opened it were a long legal-looking envelope, then a smaller square one.

"That's the will," said Preece. "What's the other one? I don't seem to remember."

Sexton picked it up. On it, neatly typed, were the words: To be placed with my Will, to be opened only at my death— followed by the initials, typed, A.S.

"It always seems curious to me," said Mr. Preece, "that people will employ a solicitor to make a perfectly sound will for them, and then clutter it up round-hand me that paper knife, would you?—with the words 'letters of instruction' which are legally ineffectual, and, in any event, so woolly drawn that they can't be carried out—good heavens!"

"What is it?"

"I can't believe it. It's impossible!"

"What isn't possible?"

"Colonel Spender—no—"

Sexton grabbed the single sheet of notepaper from the partner's hand, read it, and whistled.

"Well," he said, "the devil. I knew he was a quack, but this beats everything."

"Do you think it's true?"

"It be, can it? It's some sort of joke."

"If you think it's a joke,"

Sexton, "the most sensible thing would be to tear it up and get about it."

"Good heavens, we can't do it. If the Colonel took the trouble to leave it with his will, it must have meant me to act on it. As his executor, I've no choice."

"Then you'll have to show it to the police. They'll have to set their minds up what you're going to do about it. None to think of it, there's nothing they can do now, is there?"

"I suppose not," said Mr. Preece thoughtfully. "No."

The typewritten slip was short and to the point. It said: "Meresa Slaney was a poison-bitch. I knocked her on the head and have few regrets. I'm signing this note with my Will in case some other poor devil is suspected of it. She had plenty of enemies, God knows. Identically, if the police don't believe me, ask them whether or not they found an artificial skin glove near the body."

The note was unsigned. The lawyers were still looking at it when the telephone rang. So strong is the association of ideas that, even as Mr. Preece reached out his hand to lift the receiver, he hesitated.

"Suppose it's the police," he said. "What am I to say?"

"Why should it be the police?"

"No reason, really, I suppose. No. I'm being stupid."

Mr. Preece lifted the receiver. The girl on the switchboard said, "Oh, Mr. Preece. It's Colonel Spender for you. I'll put you through."

Mr. Preece had just sufficient presence of mind to hand his partner an extension, and both of them listened to the wheezy voice at the other end.

"Thought I'd ring you up," it said. "Just seen The Times myself. Thought I'd better explain, in case you jumped to the wrong conclusion. Ambrose Spender was my cousin. Distant cousin. Same names. Soon as I get out of this damned hospital I'll be round to see you. Got one or two things to discuss. Important things. Goodbye for now."

Mr. Preece looked at Sexton; and Sexton looked at Mr. Preece. There was a long silence. The younger man recovered his voice first.

"I think we'd better put this back in its envelope, don't you?" Sexton said. "After all, the instructions were that it wasn't to be opened until death."

"Pretend we haven't seen it?"

"That's right."

"We can't do that."

"Why not?"

"As an Officer of the Court—" said Mr. Preece.

When he used these words, Mr. Preece, unlike many solicitors, really meant something by them. He saw himself dressed in some undefined but imposing legal uniform, defending the ancient rules and practices of the law against all attackers.

When he heard the fatal words, Sexton realized that it was no occasion for flippancy. He said, speaking slowly, "If you feel that we can't ignore this information, even though it has come into our hands in an irregular manner — for we had of course no right to open the envelope until we were sure that Colonel Spender was dead — then where do you visualize our duty lies?"

This was the right approach. "Irregular" and "duty" were words which Mr. Preece understood.

He said, "We shall have to consider our next move very carefully. In my submission, we have a double duty in the matter: a duty to our client not to involve him prematurely — and an equally important duty to the public not to suppress vital information about a crime. Indeed, to suppress it entirely would render us guilty of compoundin felony."

"Accessories after the fa

"Something of that so

Like most solicitors w practices were confined conveyancing and probate, Preece really knew very l about criminal law. "And l you considered that the po are certainly still working the case? The files on a mu are never closed. Someone mentioning, only this morn that the police had a clue. W they could even be on the p of arresting some innoc person! If we produced information after that l pened it would certainly suspect. We might have ma factured it ourselves. The r is only typed—"

"And on a Reming standard machine," said S ton. "We've got half a dozen them in the office."

"Now that you mention said Mr. Preece, "it is e possible it was typed in office. I recollect that w Colonel Spender came discuss his will he arrived e for his appointment and put in one of the smaller of rooms which happened to empty — the waiting room being redeccorated at the ti you remember."

Sexton examined the n ore closely. "I think you're ht," he said. "And what's ore, he used a sheet of our per. It's that cream-laid arto that we had a stock of. e girls used to complain that was so thick they couldn't e proper carbon copies."

"I've been thinking," said . Preece. "I know the perintendent of Police at king quite well. In fact, 've played golf together more n once. Suppose that I give n this information, without ealing where it comes from." "He's certain to want to ow. What will you say when asks you?"

"It's perfectly simple. I shall that the source of the ormation is connected with e of my clients, and is efore privileged."

"I see," said Sexton doubt-y. "I hope he remembers s a friend and not just a iceman."

However, when Mr. Preece sented himself at Woking ice Station that evening, he told that the friendly -playing Superintendent was leave, and would be absent a fortnight. This was onconcerting. He hardly felt t he could withhold vital ormation that long. He nd himself talking to a much nger and less friendly ector. As soon as Mr.

Preece mentioned the name of Theresa Slaney, the Inspector said, "I think, sir, you had better wait for a few minutes. The case was handled by Central. It won't take long to get hold of Superintendent Marker. I happen to know that he's over at Weybridge."

It took forty minutes to bring Superintendent Marker to the station and by that time Mr. Preece, who had already completed a full day's work, was both hungry and tired.

The Superintendent was a huge man with a red face, who looked as if he had been poured into his enormous blue suit and left to set. He had also missed his dinner and this may have made him even brusquer than usual. He said, "I understand you've something to tell us about the Knaphill case. I was in charge of that case—in fact, I still am, so you can tell me about it." As he said this he signaled to a uniformed sergeant who had come in behind and was now seated unobtrusively in the corner with notebook open and pencil poised.

This was so different from the friendly chat which Mr. Preece had anticipated that he hardly knew how to begin. It occurred to him that he ought to establish his own bona fides first. He said, "My name is Malcolm Preece. I work—"

"That's all right," said Superintendent Marker. "I've looked you up in the Law List. And got your local particulars from the sergeant here. It's just the information I want."

"It has come to my knowledge," said Mr. Preece, picking his words carefully, "that a document exists in which a local resident confesses that he was responsible for the Slaney murder."

"Let's see it."

"I'm afraid I'm not allowed to let you have it."

"Who wrote it?"

"I can't tell you that."

"How did you get it?"

"That is also confidential."

"You'll have to tell someone sometime. Why not tell me now?"

"There will be no compulsion on me, at any time, to reveal the source of my information," said Mr. Preece with all the dignity he could muster. "It is privileged, as between solicitor and client."

The Superintendent made a noise deep down in his throat. It sounded like the noise of a hungry lion. He said, "This isn't a matter of who-owes-who-tup-pence-halfpenny. This is a case of murder. If you've really got any information, cough it up quick. If you haven't, let's all go home."

"As to whether this information is privileged, I'd be happy to refer the matter to the Law Society. And may I add that I don't care for your manner."

"I don't give a brass monkey if you like my manner or not," said the Superintendent, getting up. "You've dragged me out when I was just sitting down to my first hot meal in two days. If you nuts are going to come along with phony confessions, you might at least have a little kindness to do it in off-hours."

He signaled to the sergeant who was grinning broadly. "Come on, son," he said, "let's get home."

Mr. Preece was very angry too. But it occurred to him that he had not fully delivered the message he intended. He said, "Before you go, I might add that I wonder if you ever found the glove?"

There was a moment of total stillness. Then, without seeming to have moved, Superintendent Marker was back at the table staring at Mr. Preece, and the sergeant was sitting down again in the corner, notebook open and pencil poised.

It was as though a film director had said, "Cut. We'll take that scene again." Or this time it wasn't the same scene. The Superintendent had lost all trace of fatigue and edom. He had settled his sive form into his chair, n the air of one who was pared to stay in it all night.

"Well, Mr. Preece," he said, iat was that about a glove?"
The next two hours were ly the most unpleasant that Preece ever spent. He had er imagined that the same stion could be asked so y times and in so many erent ways. At the end of it was quite surprised to find it was only nine o'clock.

would not have been greatly rised if it had been night. His housekeeper, Mrs.
llecumb, was waiting for , looking worried.

"I couldn't imagine what happened to you," she said.
rang the stationmaster. He your train was on time, and seen you on it. I put your er in the oven, but it'll be ried up."

"I'm sorry," said Mr. Preece. ve it up in five minutes."
n he pushed past the nished Mrs. Biddlecomb, t into the library, and ed himself out a large key. It was the first time he had ever drunk spirits re dinner.

"It's quite clear," said on, "that you can't stop
. You've got to let them the whole story."

"That's quite impossible," said Mr. Preece. He had not slept well, but the coming of morning had restored some of his self-possession, and the familiar surroundings of his office had gone a long way to complete the cure.

"Why is it impossible?"

"Because they'll go straight down to the hospital and start questioning Colonel Spender.
He's a sick man. If that Superintendent starts on him, it'll probably kill him."

"It's his own fault. He's brought the whole thing on himself by writing that damn silly note."

"And how are we going to explain to the Colonel about opening it?"

Sexton said, with a touch of impatience, "Tell him the truth.
It was a mistake. And a perfectly natural one—"

"I know—but—"

"Have you considered what may happen if you don't come clean?"

"What do you mean? What could happen? They can pester me with a lot of silly questions, but they can't arrest me."

"Can't they?"

"What for?"

"For the murder of Theresa Slaney."

Mr. Preece stared at him as though his partner had gone mad.

Sexton said, "Do you know what you were doing on the evening of March 25th, two years ago?"

"Of course I don't. But I can soon find out."

Mr. Preece was a methodical man. His working diaries for the last six years were stacked in a shelf behind his desk. "March 25th? That was a Friday. I'm usually at home on a Friday. On Thursday I see I went to the local Law Society dinner. And on Saturday I played bridge. I assume that on Friday I was at home."

"Alone?"

"Naturally. As soon as Mrs. Biddlecomb has cleared and washed the dinner things and laid my breakfast, she goes home."

"Which would be about what time?"

"She's usually away by nine. Why?"

"I've been reading up the case. The medical evidence was that Mrs. Slaney died shortly before or shortly after midnight. Her house is about fifteen minutes' walk from yours, through Knaphill Woods."

"But—you're joking, aren't you? This is a piece of your nonsense, David. What possible motive could I have for killing the woman? I knew her by sight, it's true, but I don't think I'd ever spoken to her."

"It was strongly hinted the inquest that Mrs. Slaney was a high-class prostitute. Appointments by telephone was also hinted that a lot of customers were respectable citizens in the neighborhood and that she was making quite a bit of money on the side of gentle blackmail. The police were pretty certain that she was killed by one of the customers she'd squeezed too hard, or often."

"But good heavens, you're not suggesting—"

"I'm not suggesting anything. But the police do know you as well as I do."

"But," said Mr. Preece, "even if—I mean—even if there was the slightest simulacrum of truth in this fantastic suggestion, why should I have got out of my way to call the attention of the police to myself?"

"Their minds work in a peculiar way," said Sexton. "I'm afraid that the sequence of ideas which may occur to them is this: you read in The Times of the death of your neighbor and client, Colonel Spender. He was an obvious candidate for Mrs. Slaney's favors. He was a great womanizer and he lived in the neighborhood, alone when his wife died. He probably had no alibi for the night question. So you—the real murderer—decide to foist it on to him and close the case forever.

"You arrive ahead of me at the office—which you did, incidentally—type out this confession on office paper with an office machine—they'll be able to prove all that easily enough—then go down to the strongroom and put the 'confession' with the will. Knowing, of course, that we'll have it up at once since you're the executor of the Colonel's estate. I mean—it's plausible."

Mr. Preece, whose face had been growing redder and redder, said in a stifled voice, "I think you're right. I'll go round this evening."

"I see," said Superintendent Marker. He said it in a voice so neutral that the words were devoid of meaning. "Was it you or your partner who opened this—what did you call it—deed wallet?"

"I think I opened it myself."

"Could you describe it?"

"It's a stout manila folder."

Mr. Preece demonstrated the size with his hands. "We have one for each client. It would have deeds and documents in it. And any will or codicil. Important documents which we keep under lock and key."

"And when do you suppose this—this other envelope—was put in it?"

"The will was dated almost exactly a year ago. I assume the envelope was put away with it. Clients often put a letter of wishes with their will."

"You assume? You don't remember?"

"I can't say that I definitely remember it. I put documents away every day. The person who certainly will remember it is Colonel Spender."

"Yes," said the Superintendent. "I expect he might have. You see, he died this morning."

While Mr. Preece was still gaping at him, the Superintendent added, "I'll have to take instructions on this. I'd like to ask you not to go away in the meantime."

"What do you mean, go away?"

"Go abroad."

"I've no intention of going abroad," said Mr. Preece, with dignity. "I shall be going to my office at precisely the usual hour tomorrow."

"That'll be very convenient, sir. For I shall probably be calling on you."

The Superintendent was as good as his word. He called the next morning at ten o'clock, bringing the sergeant with him. They faced Mr. Preece and Mr.

Sexton across the table on which lay the Spender deed wallet.

"So this is the one, is it. Name on the outside. I see. And a number. You keep things in good order in your office, Mr. Preece."

"We have a considerable number of papers to look after."

"But it's only the important ones, like this, that you keep locked up?"

"That is so."

"Where do you keep them?"

"In the strongroom, in the basement."

"And who has the keys?"

"My partner, Mr. Sexton, and myself."

"I see," said the Superintendent. He had been fiddling with the string, and now the wallet fell open; the will in its long legal envelope and the smaller white envelope both slid out onto the table. The Superintendent, who was holding the wallet, gave it a shake. "There's more inside," he said. "What would they be?"

"The deeds of his house at Woking, I imagine," said Sexton. "And there are a couple of deeds of covenant in favor of the local hospital, I fancy. Why don't we have a look?"

The Superintendent gave the wallet a shake. The first thing which came out, with some difficulty, was a packet of deeds. Then came two separate deeds. Finally, three white envelopes.

"Hullo," said Mr. Preece. "What are those?"

Each one had, typed on it, the words: To be placed with my will and opened only at my death.

"Good heavens!" said Mr. Preece. "What on earth—"

"They must have got stuck behind the deeds," said Sexton. "Shall I—?"

He looked at Mr. Preece who looked at the Superintendent, who was watching impassively.

"We might as well," he said. "Maybe they say he changed his mind and didn't do it, after all."

The first note was short. It said: "I should like my Executors to inform the American Ambassador that I should like to see President Kennedy."

The second was shorter still. It said: "I am Jack the Ripper."

"Well," said the Superintendent. "That's two more mysteries solved, isn't it?" The atmosphere seemed suddenly to have got lighter. "I've been making a few inquiries about Colonel Spender. I understand he was a rare old leg-puller. As a matter of fact, we shouldn't have taken a lot of notice of the first note if it hadn't been for mentioning the glove. That is odd. Because we did find a glove, a single one, under the dy. We kept it up our sleeves, you might say."

"But," said Mr. Sexton, "if you didn't tell anyone, how did Colonel Spender find out?"

"We had to institute a lot of inquiries. It was a foreign glove—artificial pigskin, made in Belgium. What happened, I've no doubt, was that someone told someone else—in confidence, of course—and they passed it on. These things get out. You know how it is."

Mr. Preece nodded.

"I'm sorry it's all come to this," said the Superintendent. "But that's the way with these inquiries. We have to follow up each line until it runs dry. Come on, son."

"I'll show you out," said Sexton.

When they had gone, Mr. Preece sat staring at the little pile of documents on the table in front of him, a frown on his face. He wasn't thinking about the glove. As the Superintendent said, these things got out. Women in railway carriages who had aunts who had cooks who were walking out with policemen—that sort of thing. What was bothering him were the other envelopes. He himself had emptied the deed wallet, and was certain there had been nothing else in it.

However, as he had sometimes remarked to his clients, "If there's a theoretical solution, I can usually work it out. If I'm stuck, David Sexton can often find a practical answer."

EXT MONTH...

another ALL-NEW issue

2 NEW Christmas stories by

JOE GORES

H. R. F. KEATING

13 NEW short stories—including

MICHAEL GILBERT (legal detection)

ISAAC ASIMOV (first of a new series)

DAVID ELY (suspense)

EDWARD D. HOCH (Nick Velvet again!)

INDEX TO VOLUME FIFTY-EIGHT—JULY-DECEMBER 19

ABBOTT, JOHN: Death of a Rock-'n'-Roller	Nov.	108	GILBERT, MICHAEL: Underlined in Red	Nov
ANONYMOUS: Felony	Oct.	36	Accessories: After the Fact	Dec
ARTHUR, ELLEN: Cal Always Said	Nov.	119	GILDERS, JOHN P.: Hot Roof in Sydney	Sep
BANKIER, WILLIAM: The Road without a Name	Nov.	139	GRAY, LEN: How I Murdered My Wife	Sep
BENSEN, D. R.: Criminalim-erick (Damsel in Dis-tress)	Aug.	83	HIGHSMITH, PATRICIA: You Can't Depend on Any-body	July
Criminalimerick (Christie)	Nov.	107	HOCH, EDWARD D.: The Spy Who Knew Too Much ..	Aug
Criminalimerick (Queen) ..	Nov.	118	The Leopold Locked Room ..	Oct.
BENTLEY, PHYLLIS: Miss Phipps Is Too Modest	Dec.	46	The Theft of the Leather Coffin	Nov
BIGGLE, JR., LLOYD: Grand-father and the Right Question	Oct.	71	Captain Leopold Does His Job	Dec
BLOCHMAN, LAWRENCE G.: Dr. Coffee and the Ama-teur Angel	Oct.	122	HUNTER, EVAN: Someone at the Door	Oct.
BREEN, JON L.: Diamond Dick	Oct.	37	INNES, MICHAEL: Comedy of Discomfiture	Sept
Horsehide Sleuth	Nov.	16	LYON, DANA: The Bitter Years	Sept
BRETNOR, R.: A Matter of Equine Ballistics	Sept.	75	MACDONALD, ROSS: Midnight Blue	July
BRITTAIN, WILLIAM: Mr. Strang Hunts a Bear	Nov.	78	MALZBERG, BARRY N.: Agony Column	Dec.
CARR, JOHN DICKSON: The Jury Box	July - Dec.		MATHER, BERKELY: Treasure Trove	July
CHRISTIE, AGATHA: The Re-gatta Mystery	July	81	MAYBERRY, FLORENCE V.: The Lady of the Afghans ..	Aug
The Last Seance	Nov.	95	To Find a Millionaire	Dec.
CURTISS, URSULA: Point of No Return	July	6	MCGERR, PATRICIA: This One's a Beauty	Nov
DAVIDSON, AVRAM: The Tre-foil Company	Aug.	69	MORLEY, MCGARRY: Will Somebody Kindly Tell Me?	Sept
Summon the Watch!	Oct.	63	MR. X: The Will-o'-the-Wisp Mystery (Part Four: The Bishop)	July
DAVIS, DOROTHY SALISBURY: Lost Generation	Sept.	66	The Will-o'-the-Wisp Mys-tery (Part Five: The Queen)	Aug.
DOWNER, MARY LOUISE: Af-ter the Lights Are Out ..	Oct.	114	The Will-o'-the-Wisp Mys-tery (Conclusion: The King)	Sept.
DREYER, JOHN F.: It Just Ain't Right	July	97	NIELSEN, HELEN: The Perfect Servant	Nov.
ECKELS, ROBERT EDWARD: The Waldmeer Triptych To Catch a Spy	July	69
To Catch a Spy	Sept.	6
ELLIN, STANLEY: The Payoff ..	Nov.	6
GARDNER, ELSIN ANN: The Big Trip	Oct.	93

(Continued on page 147)

CLASSIFIED Market Place

PRICE: Rates 65¢ per word—payable in advance. Capitalized words 40¢ per word. Space reservations close 10th of 3rd month preceding COVER date. Send order to Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine, 229 Park Ave. South, New York, N.Y.

BOOKS AND PERIODICALS

THE Catalog Free! Mystery-suspense. Save to 70% Spencer Books, D. So. Halladay St., Santa Ana, 92705.

ERIES, Out of Print Paperbacks, over. Free Lists. Bengta Woo, One Court, Plainview, New York 11803.

TRICIANS: "Simplified System of Jit Bending" $3.00, Goforth, P.O. 592, Lakeland, Florida 33802.

BOOK BARGAINS$. Free Literature. today. Bluebonnet Sales, Box L, Irving, Texas 75062.

Circulars Unique Books, Campbell's B. E. Franklin, Evansville, Indiana

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITIES

IDE $40,000 Year by Mailorder! d others make money! Start with 0—Free Proof! Torrey, Box 318-T, Inti, Michigan 48197.

E Magnetic Signs. Big profits. Details. rsal, Lenora, Kan. 67645.

% PROFIT Bronzing Shoes, Free s, NBC, Box 11069-0, Kansas City,).

BLE Money-Back if you can't beat races using my system! Strauss — Brooklyn, New York 11219.

N Hong Kong Directory. World icts information. $1.00 today. Saki o Annai, Hillyard, Washington 7.

T your own LUNCHEONETTE. No ience needed. Rush $1.00 for et. Bone Craft, 2654 Nancy Ave. ngton, Penna. 18976.

RESSERS and Mailers needed. Send r for information. Lindbloom Pro- 3636 Peterson, Chicago 60645

GIFTS THAT PLEASE

the best reading in the Mechanical give Science & Mechanics! $4.00 year's subscription. Science & anics, 229 Park Avenue South, New , New York 10003.

COINS, CURRENCY & TOKENS

SILVER Dollar $2.95, Terrific List 25¢. Nelson, 346-M, Rye, New York 10580.

$10 PER Pound! Thousands of Indian & Lincoln cents from 1860's thru 1920's. Sample mixture of 20-$2. Mrs. Penny Fisher, Box 1778-K, Encino, Calif. 91316.

EDUCATION & INSTRUCTION

UNIVERSITY Degrees by mail. Via Thesis, Home study, Experience, Norman, Dept. 63, Box 3199, Pasadena, Calif. 91103.

AUTHOR, EDITOR, CRITIC will help you improve those manuscripts. Not an agent. Write for terms. R. Balfour Daniels, Ph.D., P.O. Box 8342, Houston, Texas 77004.

MISCELLANEOUS

BEAT the horses—blackjack—bingo. Free Details, Cattie, Box 5986EQ, Lighthouse Point, Florida 33064.

OLD Jam Cake Recipe from mountain Folks' of Tenn. Send 50¢ to, Cooper, 10364 66th St. N. Pinellas Park, Florida 33565.

FREE World's Largest Taped Old Radio Mystery Catalog. Detective House, 3541 Victoria Pk. Rd #117, Jacksonville, Florida 32216.

OLD South Recipes. Send $1.00. A. Waller, POB 6703, Pine Bluff, Arkansas 71601.

MONEYMAKING OPPORTUNITIES

MAKE THOUSANDS OF DOLLARS, raising rabbits, caviars, chinchillas for us. Complete. information $1.00. Keeney Brothers, New Freedom, Penna. 17349.

MAKE Your Classified Ad Pay. Get "How to Write a Classified Ad That Pulls." Includes certificate worth $2.00 towards a classified ad in this publication. Send $1.25 (includes postage) to R. S. Wayner, Science & Mechanics, 229 Park Avenue South, New York, N.Y. 10003.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING

OF INTEREST TO WOMEN

PRACTICAL tips for home, garden and workshop are in "1001 How-To Ideas." Send $1.00 for your copy (includes postage) to 1001 How-To Ideas, 229 Park Avenue South, New York, N.Y. 10003.

PSORIASIS Sufferers: Discouraged? Write for Free important information that is helping thousands! Pixacol, Box 38-QE, Avon Lake, Ohio 44102.

PERSONAL

FORTUNES told. Thorough, honest, completely personal. Send your questions with a check for $10.00 to Asmani, Kuche Majd 1-58, Amirabad, Tehran, Iran.

WHY be lonely? Write for free sealed information. P. O. Box 1592, Lakeland, Florida 33802.

PROFITABLE OCCUPATIONS

CHINCHILLA income guaranteed. Terms 25¢-Bulletin $1.00, Rainbow 11DC, Port Richey, Fla. 33578.

RARE & OUT OF PRINT BOOKS

LOCATE any Book Detective-Mystery specialty. Catalogue $1.00, Aardvarks Book Detectives, Box 15070, Orlando, Florida 32808.

MYSTERY-DETECTIVE used hard-bounds, first editions, plus SF, Sherlockiana. Free lists, Aspen Bookhouse, R.D. 1, Freeville, N.Y. 13068.

FREE CATALOGUES. Detective-Mystery Booksearch, Box 15460, Orlando, Fla. 32808.

JACK MANN. "Grey Shapes" cloth, $5, Sax Rohmer, "Sins of Severac Babylon" $6.50. Bookfinder, Box 487, Peter Stuyvesant Sta., New York, N.Y. 10009.

REMAILING SERVICE

FLORIDA remails 50¢. Confidential. P. O. Box 1592, Lakeland, Florida 33802.

REMAILS 25¢. $2.50 Monthly. Blice, Box 5212, Evansville, Indiana 47715.

NEW YORK REMAILS 25¢ each-$3.00 monthly, Foreign Accounts, Welcome, M. Cassidy, 2845 University, New York, N.Y. 10468.

SPECIAL SERVICES

ESP Laboratory. This new Research Service group can help you. For FREE information—write: Al G. Manning, ESP Laboratory, 7559 Santa Monica Blvd., Los Angeles, Calif. 90046.

MAIL EARLY IN THE DAY!

YOUR POSTMASTER

FOR 25 YEARS
THE WORLD'S MOST NEEDED GIFT

Give to help people:
CARE - New York, N.Y. 10016
or your nearest office by Gardner and Christie plus the newest ew Archer' and 'Saint' mysteries. All 11 for $1 get 2 thrillers by Agatha Christie plus 4 Perry Masons 2 Lam-Cool adventures written by Gardner under the name of A. A. Fair).

he Case of the Queenly testant by Erle Stanley Gardner. An aging beauty gets involved in a $2,000,000 insurance murder. (Publ. Ed. $5) hallowe'en Party by Agatha Christie. After she boasts of solving a murder, a child vanishes. And a town explodes over Hercule Poirot's problem. (Publ. Ed. $5.95) he Case of the Worried Dress by Erle Stanley Gardner. The only one who can save Perry's pretty client is him. (Publ. Ed. $3.50) ndless Night by Agatha Christie. Everyone's after Ellie Armitage's millions. Now someone's trying non-stop murder. (Publ. Ed. $4.50) he Case of the Fabulous Foe by Erle Stanley Gardner. 4-36 is her only I.D. Can Perry find her before she's accused of murder? (Publ. Ed. $4.95)

6. All Grass Isn't Green by A. A. Fair. Missing persons cases are a cinch for Donald Lam and Bertha Cool. But this one leads to murder. (Publ. Ed. $4.95)

7. The Case of the Careless Cupid by Erle Stanley Gardner. A well-to-do widow is doomed unless Perry finds who put arsenic in her husband's last meal. (Publ. Ed. $3.95)

8. Traps Need Fresh Bait by A. A. Fair. Donald Lam investigates a want ad that really wants a patsy—for a murder. (Publ. Ed. $3.95)

Plus a special 3-in-1 volume Club selection—including a Perry Mason newly published in book form, the latest "Saint" adventure and a new "Lew Archer" best-seller.

9. The Case of the Crimson Kiss and other stories by Erle Stanley Gardner. The murder victim is found with a kiss on his forehead. (Publ. Ed. $4.95)

10. The Saint in Pursuit by Leslie Charteris. A girl with a $50-million letter has the Reds, the Nazis, and Simon Templar on her trail. (Publ. Ed. $4.50)

11. The Underground Man by Ross Macdonald. A raging forest fire entangles Lew Archer in a web of murder. "A stunning achievement," New York Times. (Publ. Ed. $5.95)

The Detective Book Club
Roslyn, New York 11576

Please enroll me as a member and send me at once the 4 double volumes containing 4 Perry Masons plus mysteries by A. A. Fair and Agatha Christie. Also, send me the special triple volume including a Perry Mason newly published in book form and the latest by Charteris and Macdonald.

I enclose no money in advance. Within a week after receiving my books, I will either return them and owe nothing, or keep all 5 volumes containing 11 first-rate mystery stories, for the special new-member introductory price of only $1 (plus shipping charges).

As a member, I am to receive advance descriptions of all future selections, but I am not obligated to buy any. For each future triple-volume I decide to keep, I will send you only $3.39 (plus shipping charges). I may reject any volume before or after I receive it, and I may cancel my membership at any time.

Mr. }
Mrs. }
Miss }

(please print plainly)

1-UY

other side for further details.)

Address _____

30-1B

City _____

State _____

Zip _____

Imagine getting 2 great Agatha Christie whodunits and 7 Erle Stanley Gardner mysteries—including a Perry Mason now available for the first time in book form. Plus the highly-acclaimed new Lew Archer adventure by Ross Macdonald and The Saint's latest caper by Leslie Charteris. All for just $1.

These 11 mysteries in the publishers' original editions cost $51.10. But to introduce you to the benefits of membership in The Detective Book Club, we're offering you all 11—full-length and handsomely hard-bound—for a small fraction of their original price.

Of the 300 or more detective books that come out each year, the Club editors pick the best . . . which this year include gems like Ellery Queen's newest adventure, A Fine and Private Place, and selections by other top names like those featured above plus Mignon G. Eberhart, John Creasey, Ed McBain and Anthony Gilbert. (Many are club members themselves.)

As a member you can get 3 newly-published mysteries each month, complete or unabridged in 1 handsomely bound triple volume like the one shown on this page. $13.95 to $15.40 value for only $3.39.

You don't have to take a volume each month. You receive a free copy of the Club Preview which describes all coming selections and you may reject any volume before or after receiving it. You pay no money in advance, no membership fee. You may cancel membership any time.

Don't be disappointed. While the supply lasts, send this coupon to get your 11 mysteries.

11 mysteries for $1, including a Perry Mason first.

First Class
Permit No. 7
Roslyn, N.Y.

Business Reply Mail
No postage stamp necessary if mailed in the United States

Postage Will Be Paid By

The Detective Book Club

Roslyn, New York 11576

(See other for further details.)